I support aid for Nicaragua. I support aid for Panama. I think the majority of Senators support aid for Nicaragua and Panama. But the fact is that the President of the United States cannot tell either Nicaragua or Panama for sure they are getting aid until this bill passes.

The Democrats have made it very clear they are ready to go forward with the supplemental appropriations, and I hope that whoever is delaying it on the other side will change his mind because I think that President Bush is correct in seeking aid. I have had some difference with him on the amount, but he is correct in seeking aid for Nicaragua. He is correct in seeking aid for Panama, and we ought to be prepared to move forward. On this side of the aisle we are. The distinguished majority leader has said he wishes to bring the bill up, and I hope he can.

Now, having said that, let us see where we are. We know that even once this bill is passed it takes a certain amount of time to go to conference with the other body and to bring that piece of legislation back. Are we going to say, having sent a high-level delegation to Nicaragua today, the check continues to be in the mail? Actually the check has not even come out of the checkbook. Are we going to say, when President Endara comes up next week, we want to get it there for you, but one or two Members are objecting to the aid package even coming up?

Let us bring it up, let us vote it up or vote it down. If anybody does not want the aid, they can vote against it. Or they can vote for it if they want it. But either way, let us do it and get this matter resolved.

As I said before, I support aid to Nicaragua, I support aid to Panama. But I would like to have done it in different amounts at a different rate. Eventually it would involve the same amount, but do it in a way they could absorb it. That is a decision that can be made by majority vote. The majority vote in the Senate would determine what the Senate's position is on the aid, just as in the other body it will determine that, and then the committee of conference will decide the issue. But nothing can happen until we bring it up.

Mr. President, I was supposed to go to the inaugural of Mrs. Chamorro today. I told the Vice President yesterday I regretted not going with him. I thought it was more important to be here on the floor to move this foreign aid package forth. He agreed. So I stayed to do it. We are here; we are prepared. I am prepared certainly to go forward on my part. The majority leader said he is ready to bring the bill forward. We ought to do it.

I might say in that regard, Mr. President, that I commend President Bush for sending Vice President QUAYLE down there to lead the delegation. I think it is a mark of respect to Nicaragua. I would have been proud to have been there with my friend the Vice President at that inaugural. I know he will represent the United States very well and in the highest traditions at that inaugural. But, in the meantime, those of us who stayed to get the meat of the administration's foreign aid package through ought to be allowed to go forward with it.

I state somewhat the obvious, Mr. President, but I hope that Senators will join with the distinguished majority leader when he seeks to bring this bill up. I certainly will. I understand that every single Senator on the Democratic side of the aisle is ready to take this bill up so that we can vote up or down on the President's proposal.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

A NEW BEGINNING IN NICARAGUA

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today marks a new beginning in Nicaragua. Just an hour or so ago, the inauguration ceremony for Violeta Chamorro—Nicaragua's first democratically elected President—did begin.

It is a day for celebration. A protracted and bloody war is over. Daniel Ortega goes into a long-overdue retirement from office—to assume the role of, hopefully, constructive opposition. And a government reflecting the will, and pursuing the interests, of the Nicaraguan people finally will have power in Nicaragua.

Mrs. Chamorro, her U.N.O. colleagues, and most of all the people of Nicaragua—they have earned their celebration today, through courage and hard work.

We in the United States also have reason to have our own small celebration. After years of divisive debate, partisanship and—all too often—policy paralysis, the President and the Congress over the past year have forged a common front and an effective policy toward Nicaragua.

Our long support for the freedom fighters, and our joint endeavor of these past months, have paid off. Nicaraguans struggling and working together won their own victory—but we helped, and we can be proud that we did.

So, today, we join in celebrating, too.

Tomorrow, the hard work begins.

As tough as Nicaragua's long struggle for freedom has been, without doubt the task of governing will be tougher still.

Years of war and Sandinista mismanagement have left Nicaragua's society in shambles, its physical infrastructure in ruins, and its economy "belly up."

Thousands of freedom fighters will be returning to Nicaragua, looking for homes and jobs.

Daniel Ortega will turn over the Presidency to Mrs. Chamorro. But it is still not certain that the Sandinistas will turn over all power to the Chamorro government. Nor can we be sure that the Sandinistas will refrain from trying to sabotage the policies and programs of the new government.

In sum, the first months of Mrs. Chamorro's Presidency are almost sure to be a time of crisis and challenge—and perhaps even confrontation.

She has proven herself a leader of courage, dedication and skill. She will need all of those qualities in the days ahead.

And she will also need our help.

I commend the President for his prompt action in sending over $2 million in urgently needed medical assistance.

I am also very pleased that the Appropriations Committee yesterday reported out the supplemental appropriations bill, with the President's requested $300 million in aid for Nicaragua intact. As the Senate knows, there have been rumblings over the past weeks about cutting aid to Nicaragua. Happily, no such effort was made during markup, and I am hopeful no effort will be made on the floor.

And more aid will be needed. We should face up to that fact.

We have a responsibility to be as helpful as we can, in light of our own deep involvement in Nicaragua in recent years. More important, it is in our interest to help—to foster the kind of stable democracy in Nicaragua that will contribute directly to our security interests in this hemisphere.

All of that, of course, underscores again the urgency of addressing the bottom-line problem: How do we find the resources to meet the foreign aid needs of the emerging democracies? Whether we do that in part through the so-called Dole plan to shave earmarks and reallocate the resulting funds, or through even further tapping of the Defense budget, or in other ways—it is an issue that must be addressed, and soon.

In the longer run, though, what is needed most is not aid—but sensible, free market economic policies, and a dramatic increase in investment and trade.

Our aid can help Mrs. Chamorro "jump start" her economy. But only by scrapping Sandinista socialism, relying on the drive and skills of Nicaragua's small but active entrepreneurial community, inviting foreign investment, and stimulating two-way trade, will the country achieve real, sustainable prosperity.

I hope, and believe, that it is Mrs. Chamorro's intention to pursue just that strategy. I believe, if she does, she will find great support from this country—from the President and the Congress.

Mr. President, this is a great day for Mrs. Chamorro, for Nicaragua, and for freedom.

Our warmest congratulations and best wishes go to Mrs. Chamorro, and to all the people of her great country.

It is a new day for them, and for United States-Nicaraguan relations; a day to celebrate. And a day to start preparing for the hard work and the challenges that lie ahead.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. METZENBAUM). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COURT-IMPOSED TAXES

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, 1 week ago today, the U.S. Supreme Court decided the case of Missouri versus Jenkins. That case involved a school desegregation order by the judge of the Federal District Court for the Western District of Missouri.

The district court judge in trying to carry out school desegregation decided to create in the Kansas City, MO, school district a magnet school system, his theory being that he wanted to have such a standard of excellence in that school district that it would be a magnet to draw people from the surrounding area. Therefore, he determined that the Kansas City School District should have a very elaborate system of upgrading, including, among other things, the installation of a planetarium, the creation of a model U.N. General Assembly together with wiring for simultaneous translation, a 25-acre farm, and the like; all of this being very expensive.

The judge then ordered the imposition of a tax on the people of the Kansas City, MO, School District to sustain this elaborate system. The Supreme Court of the United States held that although the court should not have imposed a tax directly, as a matter, as the court said, of comity, the court could direct that local officials impose the tax notwithstanding prohibitions of State law.

Two days after the Supreme Court decided the case of Missouri versus Jenkins, I, along with Senator BOND and others, introduced in the Senate a constitutional amendment resolution. The thrust of that resolution would be to provide that courts, Federal courts, do not have the power to direct the imposition of taxes.

Mr. President, I want to assure the Senate, and indeed the people of this country, that introducing a constitutional amendment resolution 2 days after the Supreme Court speaks is not a signal of precipitous action on my part. In fact, the issue that was raised by the Supreme Court on Wednesday was more than just 2 days old at the time that the constitutional amendment was introduced.

The issue goes way back, not only to our own Constitution, but well into the roots of American democracy and of the British system of democracy from which our own system springs.

Every schoolchild realizes and is taught at about second or third grade that the fundamental premise of American democracy is, "no taxation without representation." We are taught that as the standard of American democracy. If the American people are to be taxed, they are to be taxed only by those who are elected. If they are taxed, the American people should be able to reelect or throw out of office those who imposed the tax. That is fundamental.

Our own American Revolution was fought over that concept. All of us were taught when we were school-children about the Stamp Act. All of us were taught about the Boston Tea Party. All of us were taught as little children that Parliament, located across the sea, should not have been allowed and was not allowed by our forebears to impose taxes on people on these shores.

The power to tax was one that had to be controlled ultimately by the people so the people could vote for or against those who imposed the taxes. That is fundamental to American democracy.

So when the Supreme Court of the United States decides that a Federal district judge can direct the imposition of taxes, the Supreme Court is turning on its head one of the most basic premises that we hold in this country. Federal judges are not elected by anyone. Federal judges are appointed. The Federal judiciary is created to be outside of the daily pressures of the electorate. They serve for life, and under the Constitution their salaries cannot be reduced.

The taxing scheme, by contrast, is one which is entrusted in the first instance in the House of Representatives. Why the House of Representatives? Because the House of Representatives is that body of the Congress which is closest to the people. That certainly was the case before 1913 when we first had direct elections of the Senate. The House of Representatives was the only directly elected body of Congress and it had the power and still does to initiate all tax legislation.

Taxes cannot be initiated in the Senate. We are thought to be too remote. It is deeply rooted into our constitutional scheme of things that the people have the last word in matters of taxation. But the Supreme Court has taken this expression of American democracy, "No taxation without representation," and transformed it into little more than a quaint relic of our past, something that went out with powdered wigs and hoop skirts and horses and buggies.

So Senator BOND and I have introduced a constitutional amendment to restate what we believe the Constitution said in the first place. Federal judges do not have the power to raise the taxes of the people of this country, directly or indirectly; and there is no difference, Mr. President, whether they do it directly or indirectly. There is no practical difference between raising it yourself and telling somebody else to raise it for you. The effect is the same.

It is not a judicial power and it has nothing to do with the school desegregation case. It has nothing to do with whether or not any of us feel it is a good or bad idea for a school district to have a planetarium or a U.N. General Assembly room wired for simultaneous translation. Even if we assumed that that was a good, it must be, under our Constitution, a good that is beyond the reach of the courts.

(Mr. DECONCINI assumed the chair.)

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, people have said, how then can the court enforce a desegregation order if it cannot order the increase in taxes? Since 1954, when the Supreme Court decided Brown versus Board of Education, the Supreme Court has been entering orders relating to school desegregatoin and it has been doing that without purporting to increase the taxes of the American people.

It is not the power to remedy a constitutional defect that is beyond the reach of the Court, but it is the method of imposing taxes that must be beyond the reach of the Court.

This is an issue that goes way back to the eve of the English Civil War, in the 1620's. Parliament petitioned the king to state the basic limits of the power of the king. One thing that Parliament said in the Petition of Right was, "No person can be called upon for taxes except through common consent in Parliament." The year was 1628, and the Parliament said that the king did not have the power to raise taxes. Parliament only could do that. That was the heritage that then came over to these shores. That was what was in the minds of our people, even before our Constitution was formed. That was what was in the minds of our people when they tossed the tea in the Boston Harbor. We are not going to be taxed by people we cannot vote for. But the Supreme Court, Mr. President, does not agree.

In the Federalist Papers, where the premises of the Constitution were explained, Madison wrote in Federalist No. 48: "The legislative department alone has access to the pockets of the people." The legislative department alone, said Madison, has access to the pockets of the people. That was what we assumed until the Supreme Court decided Missouri versus Jenkins 1 week ago today.

Hamilton, in Federalist No. 33, specifically said, first of all, that the power of taxation is most important among the authorities proposed to be conferred upon the Union. Then Hamilton said that collecting taxes is a legislative power. It is not a judicial power. It is a legislative power.

Mr. President, I do not minimize the difficulty in amending the Constitution of the United States even for an amendment that restates a principle that is older than our country itself; even in enacting an amendment which states what we believe the Constitution said in the first place, that unelected, lifetime Federal judges do not have the power of taxation; even such a simple and direct amendment as that is no easy matter to enact, and for good reason. We do not want a volatile Constitution. We do not want a Constitution that can be changed in a day or a week. We want a process that reflects the careful deliberation of Congress and of the State legislatures and, indeed, of the American people themselves.

So when Senator BOND and I and others introduce this resolution, we recognize that this is not going to be something that will happen immediately. It will take time and it will take debate and it will take discussion and it will take input and it will take the reflection of the American people themselves as to their understanding of the power of the legislative branch and their understanding of the power of the courts.

The most basic constitutional issues always are those that relate to the locus of governmental power: Where does power reside, at what level of government, at what branch of government; not what decisions are made, but who is making the decisions. That is the constitutional argument; not whether we approve or disapprove of the zoo or the planetarium or the United Nations wired for sound; not the specific decision, but who is making the decisions, who is making the decisions to reach into our pockets.

Who is making the decisions to tax our people; legislators or judges, elected officials or unelected officials, those who serve for a term of years or those who serve until they are carried out feet first from Federal courthouses?

It is a matter of grave importance, Mr. President. It is a matter of fundamental significance, and it is my hope that our Judiciary Committee and that Members of the Congress in general and that the American people will participate in a debate which I had believed to be settled, but a debate which has gone on now for at least 350 years.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent we be allowed to continue in morning business, and I have a question of my friend and colleague from the State of Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I have been listening with great interest to Senator DANFORTH's remarks and tend to agree with him completely. As a nonlawyer and one who does not pretend to be an expert on constitutional law that I know my distinguished colleague from Missouri is, the thought crossed the mind of this layman, while recognizing the separation and divisions of Government in the Constitution—the executive, the legislative and the judiciary—I believe that there have been many instances in the last several years at least that would give one pause for concern; that through their interpretation, the Supreme Court is not directly seeking but has the effect of making the Court superior to the other branches of Government for the several actions that they have taken.

I agree with the Senator from Missouri that it takes a long time to go through the constitutional process. He may well be right in proposing this. After I know a little bit more about it I may, indeed, join with him as a cosponsor.

My question is: Is there anything that we as a Congress, both the House and the Senate, could or should be doing in the meantime, if it is nothing more than sense of the Congress, if we can get it passed, maybe passed unanimously, would there be anything that would abridge any common understandings between the three branches of Government if the legislative branch would send a sense of Congress to the Supreme Court on our feelings on something?

We do not hesitate to do that, I would suggest, with the executive branch from time to time, whether the executive branch is controlled by a Democrat or Republican. We have raised our hackles around here at various times. Would there be anything wrong or improper, or should it be considered that pending the outcome of a lengthy process of passing a constitutional amendment, at least, maybe we should send to the Court some kind of a signal from the legislative body. I do not see how we could hurt much more their trampling on the legislative branch any more than when they get involved in a taxation case, which I think is strictly limited under the Constitution to the Congress.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the Senator from Nebraska, Mr. President.

This particular case involves not congressional Federal taxation but instead a Federal court that directs the imposition of a tax at the local level, but it is precisely the same principle of the limitation of the role of the judiciary. The principle, of course, is that judges cannot tax. That really is the very simple issue. Should they or should they not be able to tax, either imposing the tax or directing somebody else to impose the tax. That is the very simple issue.

There are people who believe that Congress can pass simple statutes restricting the Court's ability to put in place judicial remedies, provided that Congress does not limit the Supreme Court but only the lesser courts and provided Congress does not prevent the remedying of the constitutional problem that the Court seeks.

So under that theory, it may well be that the Congress by a simple statute could simply pass a law which says that courts cannot impose taxes. In fact, Senator THURMOND, I know, has introduced a bill which provides just that.

My reason for proceeding with a constitutional amendment, which is obviously much harder than the bill, is to say that protection from judicial taxation is such a fundamental premise, it was incorporated in the Constitution itself, if the Court reads it out of the Constitution, we should put it back into the Constitution.

So for the sake of the immediate remedy, yes, I think it would be possible to pass a simple bill which would handle this direct problem. And if we did it, I would certainly give serious consideration to that legislation. I would also want to proceed with a constitutional amendment, however.

Mr. EXON. That would send a signal to the Court, would it not?

Mr. DANFORTH. Yes, I think, according to the position Senator THURMOND takes, it would do more than send a signal. It would truly limit the Court's jurisdiction.

Now, Congress has tried to do that before. It usually has caused a big uproar because people have argued, well, Congress does not like some specific thing the Court has done, and therefore we try to legislate; we try to pull the rug out from under the Court in an after-the-fact manner.

I am sure that nothing we do would be beyond controversy, but I would, I believe, support a statute, although I have not cosponsored this particular form of statute as yet. I do think though, it should be very clear in the Constitution itself.

Mr. EXON. Do we not have somewhat a similar precedent here with the flag-burning issue? The Senator certainly remembers the discussions we had on that. Our first course of action was to pass legislation and see whether that was valid or not. The Court, as I understand, has said that is not valid. So it is obvious we are going to have a constitutional change.

I was just wondering, though, if possible some kind of a bill or sense-of-the-Senate or something—may cause the Court to do a little rethinking in their action, if not on the measure they originally passed, then on a similar measure that would come up in the future.

Mr. DANFORTH. It probably could be done by statute. It should be done by consitutional amendment. It should be done by one form or another, and my reason for advocating a constitutional amendment again is that the Constitution is fundamentally about grants and limitations and location of power in Government.

I think that if the Court has this wrong, as a matter of constitutional interpretation it is time to set them right.

Mr. EXON. I thank my friend from Missouri.

Mr. GLENN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

THE DEATH OF FRANK J. LAUSCHE

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to honor the memory of a very distinguished former U.S. Senator from Ohio, Frank Lausche.

Frank Lausche's life spans so much of this Nation's advancement. He was born in 1895, earned his own way at an early age when he took a job lighting gaslights on the streets of Cleveland to help his widowed mother and his nine brothers and sisters. He was forced to drop out of high school to support his family, but he never relented in the pursuit of education, completing high school by correspondence while in the Army, and fighting his way to the top of his graduating class at John Marshall Law School in Cleveland at the end of World War I.

He was a man of determination and courage. He gave up dreams of becoming a major league baseball player, as a matter of fact, to dedicate his life to public service.

Frank Lausche lost his early bids for public office. That is something that is hard for us to believe in Ohio because he became such a political institution that we are more inclined to think of the "perpetual Frank Lausche" in Ohio. But he lost his early bids for public office. But that did not stop him.

He soon made his mark in Ohio's political history, first, as a judge in the Cleveland municipal court, then in the common pleas court of Cuyahoga County, Cleveland. Elected twice as mayor of Cleveland, five times as Governor of the State of Ohio, and twice as U.S. Senator, Frank Lausche was a major political power in Ohio for over 30 years.

Senator Lausche was a man of unwavering integrity, strong beliefs, and tender feelings. He earned the trust and support of the people of Ohio by being loyal but tough, independent but honest, and unorthodox but just. He took his public responsibilities very seriously, and stood up for what he believed to be right regardless of the cost to himself.

Frank Lausche served in the U.S. Senate from 1957 until 1969, in the seat that I now have the honor and privilege to hold.

I well remember his excitement when I came to Washington after my orbital space flight back in 1962. He wanted to know all the details, wanted to talk about them, and his life literally spanned gaslight to space flight.

Frank Lausche died last Saturday in Cleveland. I urge my colleagues to join me in expressing sympathy to his friends and family as we mourn the passing of this remarkable politician and great American, Frank J. Lausche, judge, mayor, Governor, Senator—Ohioan.

Thank you.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERREY). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed in morning business to enter a statement on Lithuania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

LITHUANIA

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, for weeks and months now we have watched the people of Lithuania in their peaceful pursuit of self-determination.

As signatories to the 1975 Helsinki Final Act, both the Soviet and United States Governments have committed themselves to respect the equal rights of peoples and their right to self-determination. While it is clear that the Lithuanian effort to exert this right has put Mr. Gorbachev in a difficult position, we cannot and must not ignore overt denial of this fundamental right.

Mr. President, it should be remembered that Lithuania is not a territory seeking independence, but an occupied country seeking to restore its independence. Lithuania's independent statehood was guaranteed in a 1920 peace treaty with Moscow. This treaty was abrogated by the signing of the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact of 1939, which paved the way for Stalin's illegal annexation and occupation of Lithuania in 1940. The United States and other Western governments have never, despite 50 years of Soviet rule over those territories, recognized Lithuania, Latvia, or Estonia as part of the Soviet Union.

Over the past 2 years, the Lithuanian people have invoked the principle of self-determination and utilized the democratic and organizational opportunities Mr. Gorbachev has made available to make clear their intention to restore de facto what was already theirs de jure. It was no surprise, then, when pro-independence candidates won the vast majority of the seats in the newly restructured parliament elected on February 24 of this year. And it should not have been a surprise when on March 11 the freely elected parliament declared Lithuania to be independent of the Soviet Union. In fact, according to international law and to the United States policy of nonrecognition, the Lithuanian declaration of independence was redundant.

In effect, it was Gorbachev who validated Lithuania's historical claim to sovereignty and who made possible the first free, multiparty elections under Soviet power. Last December, the U.S.S.R. Congress of People's Deputies condemned the secret protocols to the Molotov-Ribbentrop pact. Yet Gorbachev responded to the March 11 declaration with demands for its rescindment, refusing to negotiate with the new Lithuanian Government and, most recently, imposing strict economic sanctions against Lithuania. Having opened the door to the Lithuanians and having offered to usher in democracy Gorbachev now appears to be demanding that the Lithuanian people and their representatives reverse the process which he himself initiated.

We recognize the predicament with which Mr. Gorbachev is faced. The road of reform has been challenging and unpredictable. The many crises which have surfaced include food shortages, conservative and military discontent, and certainly not least, the resurgence of nationalist sentiment among the varied peoples of the Soviet Union.

We cannot offer solutions to all of Mr. Gorbachev's problems—we do not necessarily have these solutions. We can only convey to him our unwavering support of the democratic processes he has promoted. We have respected Gorbachev's political boldness in opening up the process of democratization in the Soviet Union. This process, however, loses its meaning if it is implemented in an arbitrary way. We must—again without offering final solutions—strongly encourage a peaceful and fair process in the resolution of the questions surrounding the de facto restoration of Lithuania's independence.

The Lithuanian Government has repeatedly sought negotiations with Moscow since the March 11 declaration of independence. Acknowledging the reality of the day, they have made clear that they do not expect full independence simply to occur overnight. In fact, they have offered to negotiate with the Soviets on every issue except that of Lithuania's independence. In response to Soviet concerns, the Lithuanian Parliament has agreed to a moratorium on new independence-related legislation and has offered to compromise on the issues of citizenship, military draft and Soviet-owned property.

Yet Gorbachev remains intransigent. The Lithuanian concessions, it appears, are not enough. Last week Soviet authorities drastically reduced supplies of oil, natural gas, foodstuffs, and other vital goods to Lithuania. Still resolute in their quest for independence, the Lithuanians have responded by rationing these goods and attempting to secure other means of obtaining essential supplies.

Perhaps the most disturbing incident of the past week was the storming by Soviet troops of a printing plant in Vilnius and the severe beating of a number of people in the building at the time. Among those injured was a deputy in Lithuania's recently elected legislature. There can be no justification for this violent suppression of an independent, free press.

Mr. President, as chairman of the Helsinki Commission, I have witnessed first-hand the positive changes of the "Gorbachev era." I join with many of my colleagues here today in recognizing the importance of improving our ties with the Soviet Union. But we must not renounce our values and standards. Our principled stand is in support of the process of self-determination which the Lithuanians have peacefully undertaken. We must expect no less of Mr. Gorbachev than full adherence to the principles of the Helsinki Final Act and the Vienna Concluding Document. If Mr. Gorbachev maintains an uncompromising posture, I believe we are left with no choice but to suspend United States-Soviet trade talks and to postpone next month's summit meeting in Washington.

President Bush, by his weak response to Soviet actions so far, intimates that he would rather give Mr. Gorbachev photo opportunities in Kennebunkport than stand on principle. This is a time for America to let Mr. Gorbachev know that there are values which we will not forsake. Instead, President Bush appears to be paralysed by the fear that our relationship with the Soviet Union will fall apart if we take a principled stand on Lithuania. Apparently our values are not as important as Mr. Gorbachev's prestige. That is not a sound basis for a meaningful relationship under any circumstances.

Gorbachev demonstrated great vision when he began the process of democratization. We urge him now to abide by the process which he has begun and urge him to take the next step and begin a constructive process of dialog.

JERUSALEM AND THE PEACE PROCESS

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, thoughtful people can and do disagree about certain aspects of Senate Concurrent Resolution 106 on the status of Jerusalem and the peace process, but I fear that many of those who oppose the resolution have overlooked the fact that the resolution stresses not only that Jerusalem must remain an undivided city, but also that it must be a city in which the rights of every ethnic and religious group are protected. The resolution also expresses the Senate's sincere wish that all parties involved in the search for peace maintain strong efforts to bring about negotiations between Israel and Palestine representatives.

When I introduced this resolution I declared that:

> Israel must make sacrifices for there to be peace in the Middle East. Yet no Israeli Government will join a process which it believes might end with the dismemberment of its eternal capital. No Israeli Government can address the concerns of Jerusalem's Arab inhabitants if addressing these concerns will be construed as suggesting that it is prepared to negotiate away the right of Jews to dwell in security throughout a united Jerusalem.

I believe that our Government must reassure Israel concerning Jerusalem and I also believe that an Israel calmed by such reassurances must increase its efforts to find a creative and meaningful solution to the conflict with the Palestinians.

Yes, the United States Senate called for acknowledgment of Jerusalem as capital of Israel, but it also called for sensitivity toward the rights of every ethnic and religious group in that city and negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

In that light I would like to say a few words about the much discussed leasing by a Jewish group of the St. Johns Hospice in Old Jerusalem. This matter is currently before the courts in Israel and both the lower and district courts have ruled that the transaction is invalid under the terms of the building's original lease. In addition, the timing, wisdom, and method of funding of this move into the Christian Quarter have been widely questioned by a broad cross section of political and rabbinic figures in Israel and by most major Jewish organizations in the United States.

The families that moved into St. Johns Hospice may as well have been acting in an illegal fashion and they certainly were acting in disregard to the spirit of sensitivity that we called for in Senate Concurrent Resolution 106. At the same time, this incident dramatically demonstrates the profound difference between Israel and most of her neighbors. On one side, a possibly illegal move into an empty hotel is openly challenged by an unfettered press, publicly debated by Israelis of every religious and political stripe, sharply criticized by Israeli's strongest supporters in this country and is under appropriate review by a judicial system which has long proven itself to be immune to domestic political pressures. On the other side, we have sterile dictatorial rights and silent acquiesence if not actual sponsorship of murder and terrorism as instruments of national policy. Thus, while we may well be disturbed by this most recent incident in Israel, we must remember the context within which occurred, namely a society which has in a very brief period internalized values and procedures which we in the United States have always cherished.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DIRE EMERGENCY SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, as some are aware, there is a very important matter pending on the calendar, the supplemental appropriations bill, which contains appropriations for a host of important programs. A couple of the principal provisions of that bill deal with aid to Panama and Nicaragua, which, of course, are more timely than ever, given the events in that region.

Unfortunately, the bill includes a provision added at the last minute in the committee which seeks to undo the work of the Congress accomplished earlier this year in refusing to authorize the District of Columbia to spend funds raised within the District to pay for abortions. The Senate ultimately blocked the District from spending local funds, and the bill was ultimately signed by the President.

This provision seeks to undo all of that. I do not think it is going to succeed. But it is that provision which is holding up consideration of this bill. It is an important bill. Everyone knows that it is important.

If anyone is of a mind to point fingers or cast blame, it should be pointed and cast in the direction of those who are responsible for this amendment being added to the bill at the last moment, because the President yesterday, before that action took place, through his spokesman, made it perfectly clear that if that language relative to the District of Columbia were added, the President would veto the bill.

I wanted to cite that passage from a letter of April 19, in which the Budget Director, Richard Darman, says on page 3:

We understand that an effort may be made in the Senate to use H.R. 4404 as a vehicle for modifying the abortion provisions in the fiscal year 1990 District of Columbia Appropriations Act. The President vetoed H.R. 3610, the second D.C. appropriations bill, because of language identical to that which the Senate would consider.

That was the language inserted at the last moment yesterday and is now in the bill on the calendar.

Mr. Darman goes on to say that—

We strongly believe that the appropriations legislation should not be used to reconsider nonemergency issues that were resolved in the regular 1990 appropriations process. If Congress presents the President with the bill that contains the abortion language that was included on H.R. 3610, the senior advisors will recommend that he veto the bill, and I am virtually certain that he would do so.

Well, Mr. President, this Senator has spoken with senior officials at the White House today. Their intent remains the same. They are adamant on the point. And they are not just talking about specific language; their intent to veto is a generic intent, that if anything approaching this language reaches the President's desk, he will veto it.

So that is what is holding up this bill. It is a measure that does not belong on this bill. It is, in fact, legislation on an appropriations bill, so it is out of order on that score; but it does not have any place on this bill, because it is a controversial measure. The authors know it will impede the progress of this bill, and they now know that the President will veto the bill.

So the bill is languishing on the calendar, leadership hoping to persuade the authors to remove that language from the bill. That is what is holding it up. If anybody is of a mind to assess blame for the delay in passing of this important bill, I hope that my remarks will give them some guidance. I thank the Chair.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DIRE EMERGENCY SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 521, H.R. 4404, the supplemental appropriations bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 4404) making dire emergency supplemental appropriations for disaster assistance, food stamps, unemployment compensation administration, and other urgent needs, and transfers, and reducing funds budgeted for military spending for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the majority leader?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments; as follows:

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I want to thank the distinguished Republican leader, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and the other Senators with whom we have been discussing this matter for several hours now. I am pleased that we are able to gain unanimous consent to proceed to this important legislation. It took a little longer than we had anticipated or hoped, but in any event we are now on the bill and will remain on it until completion.

In accordance with the decision I made yesterday following consulation with the Republican leader, we had not intended any votes today in any event since nine Senators are presently in Nicaragua attending the inauguration of Mrs. Chamorro as President of that country.

What we propose for this evening is simply an opening statement by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, and then we will go out. We will come back in at 9:30 in the morning, be back on this bill at 10, begin with an opening statement by Senator HATFIELD, the ranking member of the committee, and then be prepared to proceed with respect to the bill.

My hope is that we can finish the bill tomorrow. Senators who have amendments are encouraged to be here tomorrow to offer their amendments if they have them. This is important legislation. It is deserving of careful consideration by the Senate and of what I hope to be prompt action tomorrow.

Again, Mr. President, I thank my colleagues for their cooperation. I am pleased now to yield to the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader and also want to express my thanks to the majority leader and the distinguished chairman, Senator BYRD, and my colleagues on this side, and both sides, for that matter, because anybody could have objected up until Friday until 10 o'clock under the 2-day rule. We had only one concern on this side, and as soon as the report and the bill was delivered, we had word back within an hour that it is fine and it satisfied any questions that we had. We had cooperation. As the majority leader pointed out, it was rather difficult to make a great deal of progress today because of the absence of a number of our Senators who I think have every reason to be missing today. It was a very important ceremony that they attended in Nicaragua. We have been involved in this in the Senate for years.

I certainly commend them for making the trip. It was not an easy trip. I think they got up at 3:30 or 4 o'clock this morning and they get back at 11 o'clock or midnight tonight. So it is a long, long trip. So I thank my colleagues on both sides for participating in the inaugural ceremony of Violeta Chamorro.

We are prepared to cooperate in any way we can with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. This is important legislation. We will be as helpful as we can.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank both leaders for working together to secure the request to proceed to the bill.

Let me say for the record that I have been around all day and ready to proceed and so have the subcommittee chairman, to my knowledge; they have been around. I do not say this in criticism of anyone. The rules are here, and we have to abide by them. Any Senator has a right to object to proceeding before the 2-day rule has expired.

The distinguished Senator from Oregon, the ranking member, will make his opening statement in the morning. So it is my feeling, as has been indicated by the majority leader and the Republican leader, that once I finish my statement, as far as I am concerned we can go out and start anew tomorrow morning at 10.

I would be very happy to wait until Senator HATFIELD is here, but that would inconvenience him and we would gain nothing by it. He will make his opening statement in the morning.

Mr. President, the bill before the Senate, H.R. 4404, is the dire emergency supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1990. It includes appropriations totaling $1.6 billion for mandatory programs. These are programs for which funding is statutorily set and, therefore, beyond the control of the Appropriations Committee.

Among the amounts recommended by the committee for these mandatory programs are: Food stamps, $705 million; VA compensation and pensions, $190 million; VA loans, $245 million; and firefighting costs of $433.5 million.

For discretionary programs, the bill contains appropriations totaling $1.695 billion in new budget authority and $913.9 million outlays. Both the budget authority and outlays are fully offset for discretionary appropriations for rescissions from Department of Defense appropriations.

Title I of the bill contains funding for disaster assistance totaling $137 million. These funds are needed to provide assistance to States affected by recent flooding. Included in title I is an appropriation of $20 million for flood control programs of the Corps of Engineers; $42 million—an increase of $11 million above the House-passed bill—for flood prevention programs in the Department of Agriculture; and $50 million for the disaster relief programs under the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA].

Title II of the bill contains discretionary appropriations for various programs throughout many departments and agencies of Government. Included are appropriations for:

Bureau of the Census, $110.0 million; Low-income home energy assistance, $50.0 million; State unemployment offices, $99.6 million; Centers for Disease Control, $31.5 million; Head Start, $165.7 million—and, by the way, that was added yesterday by the amendment that Senator LEAHY and I cosponsored—and VA Medical Care, $94.0 million.

The bill provides $420,000,000 in assistance to Panama and $300,000,000 for Nicaragua, to be available through fiscal year 1991. This is the same as the amounts contained in the supplemental appropriation as passed by the House.

In addition, the bill provides $15,000,000 in economic support funds for countries in the Caribbean, and $30,000,000 in economic support funds and development assistance for Sub-Saharan Africa. The funds for Africa are to restore money the administration took away from Africa aid programs in February for Panama. The House bill also contains these same levels.

The committee bill provides $75,000,000 for the State Department's migration and refugee assistance account. Seventy million dollars of this was requested by the President to fund additional refugee admissions to the United States he has already approved for fiscal 1990, but for which he did not request sufficient funds in his budget request last year. The committee earmarks the remaining $5,000,000 to help Israel absorb the costs of resettling immigrants. This is also the same as the House provision.

To help meet emergency refugee needs, the committee also provides $25,000,000 to replenish drawdowns the administration has made in the emergency refugee and migration assistance fund. The committee's recommendation, which is the same as that of the House, will raise the ERMA fund, emergency refugee and migration assistance fund back to the $50,000,000 level established in the fiscal year 1990 Foreign Operations Appropriations Act.

The committee bill contains a section providing for a $400,000,000 increase in the loan guaranty ceiling of Housing Investment Guaranty Program of AID. This program is earmarked to assist Israel to provide housing for the influx of refugees from the Soviet Union. The committee language requires Israel to pay administrative charges to participate in the Housing Investment Guaranty Program.

Finally, the committee removes the $215,000,000 ceiling on medium term loans of the Export-Import Bank established in the current Foreign Operations Appropriations Act. This is the same as the House recommendation.

Mr. President, I have provided only a brief summary of the bill. It is a bill that contains appropriations for emergency disaster assistance and for many important discretionary programs, in addition to the foreign aid appropriations contained in the bill. All discretionary appropriations are fully offset, so the bill is in conformance with section 311(a) of the Budget Act—it is deficit neutral.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(The nominations received today are printed at the end of the Senate proceedings.)

LINE-ITEM VETO—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 111

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with accompanying papers; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Congress of the United States:

I forward to you today a Joint Resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to authorize the President to disapprove or reduce items of spending authority and to disapprove substantive provisions contained in appropriations measures.

Amending our national charter is a profoundly serious step, and I am fully aware of the great responsibility involved in proposing such an action. My proposal, however, is supported by ample precedent. Today, the Governors of 43 of the 50 States have line-item veto authority, and for more than a century American Presidents have urged the Congress to adopt this reform at the Federal level. We have never needed it more than now. By enabling the President to open up massive omnibus spending packages and pare out wasteful and unneeded spending, this amendment would address one of the most serious and intractable issues facing the Nation today—the collapse of Federal fiscal discipline that has helped to saddle us with trillions of dollars of debt.

This amendment has been painstakingly crafted to ensure that the Congress has a chance to pass on each item lined out of a bill, using procedures essentially identical to those now in the Constitution. Its only purpose is to enable both the President and the Congress to take a closer look at the way we spend the taxpayers' money—to bring out into the sunlight the kinds of hidden, abusive spending proposals that would never make it on their own.

I look forward to working with you on this proposal, and I am confident that by enacting it we will place the Constitution and the Nation on a sounder footing than ever before.

GEORGE BUSH.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1990.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. MCCAIN, and Mr. DASCHLE):

S. 2512. A bill to establish a new federalism for American Indians, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

NEW FEDERALISM FOR AMERICAN INDIANS ACT

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I rise on behalf of myself, Senator JOHN MCCAIN, and Senator TOM DASCHLE today to introduce a bill which authorizes a new federalism for American Indians. This bill responds to the principal recommendation of the Special Committee on Investigations that the United States renew its commitment to tribal self-government by offering tribes the option of receiving Federal Indian program funds as direct block grants. It would free tribes from the bonds of the Federal bureaucracy which frequently frustrates tribal self-determination.

The legislation authorizes the use of mutually negotiated agreements between Indian tribes and the Federal Government to strengthen the Federal-Indian trust relationship. These agreements will convert current discretionary funds for Federal Indian programs received by tribes into permanent entitlement funds in exchange for tribal agreement to assume full responsibility for self-government.

The bill specifies minimal conditions which both the Federal Government and tribal governments must agree to meet. For example, the Federal Government shall agree to relinquish its current right to review and approve or disapprove tribal government transactions. In turn, the tribes must agree to administer the Federal funds received under the agreements in accordance with standards of accountability which have been established jointly by the tribal government and Federal Government as part of the negotiated agreements.

I want to emphasize that nothing in this proposed bill will change the fundamental trust responsibility which the United States assumed when it entered into binding treaties with the Indian tribes of this Nation. It does not alter tribal governments' current legal jurisdiction, status or treaty rights. Instead, the proposal is designed to build upon the government to government relationship between Indian tribes and the Federal Government. The intent of the proposal is to reinforce the policy of self-determination.

I believe that the new federalism proposal presents everyone with the opportunity to consider the most meaningful ways in which the United States can meet its commitment to tribal governments. For many years, tribal leaders have said that they are in the best position to solve their own problems given the adequate support and freedom to set their own priorities. The new federalism attempts to respond to this longstanding appeal from Indian tribes. In fact, I have heard from some of the tribes who have been at the forefront of the move to reduce the role of the Federal bureaucracy in the administration of Federal Indian programs. They are very interested in the new federalism and I look forward to working with them on this bill. At the same time, I am sure that there are tribes who will find this proposal unacceptable. Others will want to take a long and careful look at the bill before they take a position.

I recognize that this bill will have to undergo extensive review and discussions. I hope that in the course of engaging in this dialog we define all the critical issues which must be addressed if we are to chart a truly new course in Federal-Indian relations. I view the introduction of the bill today today only as a beginning and offer this proposal as a vehicle for discussing the best way the U.S. Government can fulfill its legal and moral responsibility to its native American citizens. I intend to work with the distinguished chairman of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs on developing a full hearing schedule for the bill. In the end, I hope we will be able to agree on a bill which will strengthen tribal governments so true self-determination can become a reality for all Indian people.

I am confident that this proposal will generate much debate in Indian country and want to encourage all interested parties to come forward with their comments, criticisms, and suggestions. I am committed to considering all points of view.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEC. 2. FINDINGS; NATIONAL GOALS.

(a) After careful review of the historical and special relationship between the United States and the Indian people, the Congress finds that—

(1) the United States has unique fiduciary responsibilities and obligations toward the Indians, and the Indians have unique rights and privileges, as set forth in treaties, agreements, statutes, and Executive Orders;

(2) the United States originally recognized Indian tribes as independent, sovereign nations with inherent powers of self-government;

(3) in exchange for the lands that now comprise most of the United States, the Federal Government promised the Indian tribes permanent, self-governing reservations, along with Federal goods and services;

(4) the United States has repeatedly broken those promises throughout most of the last two centuries by maintaining a stifling Federal bureaucracy in Indian country and failing to deal with Indian tribal governments as responsible partners in our federal system;

(5) today the Federal Government spends more than $3,000,000,000 per year on Federal Indian programs, including but not limited to the Bureau of Indian Affairs and the Indian Health Service, yet little of these funds reach the Indian people;

(6) the Indian people suffer from extreme poverty, poor health, high suicide rates, and substandard housing;

(7) Federal Indian programs are generally unresponsive to the Indian people, ensnarled in red tape, and riddled with fraud, mismanagement, and waste;

(8) Federal officials have repeatedly ignored known problems and, among other misdeeds, have—

(A) hired teachers at reservation schools despite their known records of child abuse;

(B) failed to heed warnings that their Indian preference contracting programs were dominated by fraudulent shell companies; and

(C) known of mismanagement of Indian natural resources, but refused to stop it; and

(9) Indian tribes, even with limited resources and authority under current Federal law, have established innovative programs that are tribally conceived and directed, and greatly benefit the Indian people.

(b) The Congress declares as major national goals the need to—

(1) reaffirm the status of Indian tribes as sovereign entities with inherent powers of self-government, as guaranteed in treaties, agreements, statutes, and Executive Orders;

(2) strengthen and stabilize Indian tribal governments to promote tribal self-determination and self-sufficiency;

(3) enable the United States and any Indian tribe, on a voluntary, government-to-government basis, to negotiate a mutual agreement that affirms the freedom and authority of the tribe to assess its own needs, set priorities, and design budgets to address those priorities; and

(4) provide each tribe with an annual grant equal to its proportional share of the current Federal Indian budget, as a permanent entitlement with a cost-of-living allowance, in lieu of Federal programs and services.

SEC. 3. PURPOSES.

The purposes of this Act are to—

(1) establish an Office of Federal-Tribal Relations to represent the President of the United States in negotiations with Indian tribes;

(2) allow Indian tribes that are accountable to, and govern with the consent of, their own members to negotiate with the President's Office of Federal-Tribal Relations; and

(3) establish parameters for negotiating New Federalism Agreements between the United States and Indian tribes that will protect and advance the interests and rights of the Indian people.

TITLE II—NEW FEDERALISM AGREEMENTS

(e) Nothing in this section shall preclude the parties from mutually agreeing to arbitrate or mediate any disputes which arise from the process of negotiating a New Federalism Agreement nor from seeking relief in a United States district court for a failure to negotiate in good faith under this Act.

(4) waive the applicability to the Indian tribe of all other provisions of Federal laws and regulations (except the provisions of this Act) that require an officer or employee of the Executive Branch of the Federal Government to review, approve, or disapprove resolutions or actions of the recognized governing body of the Indian tribe, but only if both parties concur that such waiver is consistent with this Act and with other provisions of such Agreement and is in the best interest of the Indian tribe and its members;

(A) the transfer of any of such assets is approved by the recognized governing bodies of at least 75 percent of the Indian tribes whose members benefit directly from such assets, and

(B) such approving Indian tribes represent at least 75 percent of the Indians who benefit directly from such assets, as determined by the Director;

(5) ratification of such Agreement by the Indian tribe in accordance with the written constitution or other governing document of the Indian tribe.

(d) Attempts to negotiate an agreement that would not be in full compliance with the provisions of subsections (a), (b), and (c) shall be considered bad faith negotiation in violation of section 202(a). The Director shall report any such attempts to the Congress in any report submitted under section 301.

SEC. 204. LIMITATIONS ON NEW FEDERALISM AGREEMENTS.

(3) affect or modify, in any way, the right of any Tribe or any State or local government to exercise power in Indian country, including, but not limited to—

(A) jurisdiction over criminal offenses;

(B) jurisdiction over civil causes of action;

(C) jurisdiction to adjudicate, in probate proceedings or otherwise, the ownership or right to possession of any real or personal property, including water rights, belonging to any Indian or Indian tribe, or any interest therein;

(D) power to tax or regulate the use of real or personal property, including water rights, of any Indian or Indian tribe; or

(E) power to regulate, control, license, or tax hunting, trapping, fishing, gathering, or other behavior.

(b) Attempts to negotiate an agreement that would not be in full compliance with the provisions of subsection (a) shall be considered bad faith negotiation in violation of section 202(a). The Director shall report any such attempts to the Congress in any report submitted under section 301.

SEC. 205. TRIBAL SELF-GOVERNANCE GRANTS.

(a) The Director shall provide to each Indian tribe, under the terms of a New Federalism Agreement entered into by the Indian tribe that is in effect, a Tribal Self-Governance Grant in the amount determined with respect to the Indian tribe under subsection (b).

(b)(1)(A) For the first fiscal year in which an Indian tribe is to receive a Tribal Self-Governance Grant, the Indian tribe shall be entitled to receive as the Tribal Self-Governance Grant a total amount equal to the Indian tribe's proportional share of the sum of—

(i) the total amount appropriated for the fiscal year for all Federal Indian programs, plus

(ii) the total amount appropriated for the fiscal year for all Tribal Self-Governance Grants.

(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A), the proportional share of an Indian tribe is the percentage determined by dividing the population of the Indian tribe by the total population of all Indian tribes. Such calculations shall be made using the extended service population figures of the Bureau of Indian Affairs of the Department of the Interior, as of November 1, 1989.

(C) If an eligible Indian tribe whose membership was not counted as part of the extended service population figures of the Bureau of Indian Affairs of the Department of the Interior as of November 1, 1989, notifies the Director of its intent to negotiate a New Federalism Agreement pursuant to section 201(a)(1), the Director shall estimate a fair and equitable amount for the Tribal Self-Governance Grant of the Indian tribe and shall request in writing that the Congress authorize and appropriate additional funds in the amount of such estimate.

(2) For the second fiscal year in which an Indian tribe is to receive a Tribal Self-Governance Grant under the terms of a New Federalism Agreement, and for each fiscal year thereafter, the Indian tribe shall be entitled to receive as the Tribal Self-Governance Grant the same total amount that the Indian tribe received as the Tribal Self-Governance Grant in the previous fiscal year, adjusted for each fiscal year by a cost-of-living allowance equal to the percentage change in the United States Gross National Product Implicit Deflator, using the beginning of fiscal year 1992 as the base.

(c) The Director shall make such adjustments for population for purposes of this section as may be necessary on the basis of each decimal census following the date of the enactment of this Act.

(d) Tribal Self-Governance Grants shall be exempt from reduction under any order issued under part C of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act of 1985 (2 U.S.C. 901, et seq.).

(e) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any Tribal Self-Governance Grant shall be treated as tribal funds that were not derived from the Federal Government for the purpose of any Federal law which requires the Indian tribe to make a contribution in order to receive further Federal funds.

(f) Tribal Self-Governance Grants shall be obligated on October 1 of each fiscal year and shall be advanced in accordance with applicable Treasury regulations and shall remain available for obligation and expenditure during any subsequent fiscal year.

(g) Except as otherwise provided, approval of a New Federalism Agreement by the Government of the United States shall constitute a pledge of the full faith and credit of the United States for the full payment of the Tribal Self-Governance Grants specified in this section. Such obligation of the United States under this title shall be enforceable in the United States Claims Court, or its successor court, which shall have jurisdiction in cases arising under this Act.

The decisions of such Court shall be reviewable as provided under Federal law.

SEC. 206. PURCHASE OF LAND.

An Indian tribe that expends funds derived from a Tribal Self-Governance Grant to purchase land, or a majority interest therein, within the boundaries of the reservation of the Indian tribe (or adjoining, on at least two sides, lands subject to the Indian tribe's jurisdiction) may, by duly enacted resolution of the recognized governing body of the Indian tribe, extend its jurisdiction to the newly acquired land.

SEC. 207. EFFECT ON EXISTING RIGHTS AND PROGRAM ELIGIBILITY.

(a) Nothing in this Act, or in any New Federalism Agreement entered into pursuant to this Act, shall be construed as—

(1) requiring or permitting the termination of any existing trust responsibility of the United States with respect to any Indians;

(2) affecting, modifying, diminishing, or otherwise impairing the sovereign immunity from suit enjoyed by any Indian tribe;

(3) affecting, modifying, diminishing, or otherwise impairing the existing immunity of any Indian tribe or Indian from any State's power to administer justice, regulate behavior, or tax persons or property;

(4) affecting the existing eligibility for Federal financial assistance of State or local governments, or school systems or agencies thereof;

(5) affecting the existing obligations of State or local governments, or school systems or agencies thereof; or

(6) having any effect described in section 204.

(b) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, receipt of a Tribal Self-Governance Grant shall not, by itself, preclude the eligibility of an Indian tribe or its members to receive, or benefit from—

(1) Federal financial assistance, programs, or services which Indians or Indian tribes receive on some basis other than their status as Indians, regardless of whether such program specifically includes Indians or Indian tribes among designated beneficiaries; or

(2) State or local governmental financial assistance, programs, or services.

(2) certify an annual financial statement, prepared in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, which accounts for the use of all Federal funds, including but not limited to Tribal Self-Governance Grants, expended or obligated by the Indian tribe, its recognized governing body, or any legally established organization which is controlled, sanctioned, or chartered by such governing body.

(b) Records retained pursuant to subsection (a) shall be available, for the purpose of audit and examination, to—

The reports shall be in such form and detail and shall be submitted at such time as the Director may prescribe.

(c)(1) In addition to any report required under subsection (a) or (b), the Director shall submit a written report to the President, the Congress, and the recognized governing body of an Indian tribe within sixty days from the date on which the Director determines that the Indian tribe, subsequent to entering into a New Federalism Agreement—

(B) engages in a clear pattern of gross negligence or mismanagement in the handling of Tribal Self-Governance Grants or Federal Indian program assets provided to the Indian tribe pursuant to such Agreement; or

(C) clearly expresses a desire to renegotiate or reverse fundamental provisions of such Agreement by—

(i) duly enacting a resolution of the tribe's recognized governing body which clearly and unambiguously requests such renegotiation or reversal; and

(ii) requesting such renegotiation or reversal by a majority vote of all adult enrolled members of the tribe at a special referendum held for that purpose and conducted in the same manner as provided in section 201(a)(2)(D).

(b) In coordination with the affected Federal department or agency, the Director shall provide such assistance, other than financial assistance, as the Director deems necessary and proper to any Federal employee, not covered by subsection (a), serving under an appointment not limited to one year or less who has left or will soon leave Federal employment because of the elimination of such employee's position by the transfer of Federal Indian programs from the Federal Government to an Indian tribe that enters into a New Federalism Agreement.

SEC. 303. PROMULGATION OF RULES AND REGULATIONS.

(a) The Director is authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry out the provisions of this Act. All of such rules and regulations shall be made in a manner that promotes the maximum participation of Indian tribes.

(a) To the extent that there is a conflict between any provision of this Act and any other provision of Federal Indian law, the provisions of this Act shall govern.

(b) If any provision of this Act or the application thereof to any Indian tribe, entity, person, or circumstance is held invalid, neither the remaining provisions of this Act, nor the application of any provisions herein to other Indian tribes, entities, persons, or circumstances, shall be affected thereby.

TITLE IV—AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 401. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

(a) There are authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year in which this Act is enacted, and for each fiscal year thereafter, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act. Such sums shall remain available until expended.

(b) Notwithstanding subsection (a), nothing in this Act shall be considered to authorize appropriations for any Tribal Self-Governance Grant—

(1) for the fiscal year in which this Act is enacted or the first fiscal year succeeding such year; or

(2) for an Indian tribe if the New Federalism Agreement entered into by the Indian tribe has taken effect, in accordance with section 203(c), less than twelve months before such appropriation.

(c) Funds for Tribal Self-Governance Grants made to Indian tribes for the first fiscal year for which the Indian tribes are to receive a Tribal Self-Governance Grant shall be transferred or reprogrammed from the appropriations made for Federal Indian programs by a uniform percentage reduction in the appropriations made for the Federal Indian programs of each Federal department and agency for that fiscal year.●

● Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator DECONCINI today as a cosponsor of a bill to authorize a new federalism for Indian tribes. I view this bill as an important step in continuing the dialog necessary to resolve many of the problems in the administration of Federal Indian programs which were identified by the Special Committee on Investigations during the last 2 years.

It is abundantly clear that we have failed to keep many of our basic commitments to the Indian tribes. Among the most basic of our promises was that the tribes would continue to be self-governing in return for their agreement to cede most of their lands to the United States. Instead of true self-governance, the tribes now find themselves having to contend with an often arbitrary and wasteful Federal bureaucracy which meddles in all aspects of Indian governance.

During the 100th Congress, Senator INOUYE, the chairman of the Select Committee on Indian Affairs, along with Senator EVANS, responded to tribal pleas for true self-governance by establishing a self-governance demonstration project. Seventeen tribes are currently participating in this project and I am confident that they will successfully demonstrate their ability to operate their governments free from stifling Federal bureaucratic controls. The concept of a new federalism seeks to build upon the self-governance demonstration project and to extend it to all interested tribes.

Mr. President, I am sure that this bill is an important vehicle for discussion. I believe that it will help everyone focus on some of the more difficult issues involved in promoting tribal self-governance. I have already heard from Indian leaders who are concerned about allocations of Federal funds and the continuation of the trust responsibility. It is important for everyone to understand that it will take a lot of careful thought and discussion before we can craft final legislative language on these issues and other points of concern. Some Indian leaders have flatly rejected the concept of New Federalism as nothing more than a disguise for the discredited policy of termination. While I appreciate this concern, nothing could be further from the truth. We propose to strengthen, not eliminate, the role of tribal governments in our Federal system. I voted in the 100th Congress to repeal the termination resolution and I will not support any legislative action which would return us to that misguided policy.

I welcome the views of all interested parties as we deliberate on this issue in the months and years ahead.●

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ:

S. 2513. A bill to require Congress to purchase recycled paper and paper products to the greatest extent practicable; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CONGRESSIONAL RECYCLING ACT

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Congressional Recycling Act of 1990.

According to the Environmental Protection Agency, Americans generate 160 million tons of trash every year, 50 percent of the world's total trash. Only 10 percent of this trash is recycled—most of the rest is disposed of in landfills. As I have stated here before, we cannot let this trend continue. The EPA expects that 75 percent of our existing landfills will be closed within 15 years, and they do not anticipate many new ones being opened.

For this reason, I think it is imperative that we encourage the American people to recycle more and use more recycled products. I am pleased by the number of bills that have been introduced in Congress to promote recycling—indeed, I sponsored one myself to encourage the recycling of old newsprint. However, I feel that we as a Congress must set the example for the rest of the Nation. Congress currently produces 20,000 tons of trash every year. Last year, we passed a resolution that I sponsored to set up a Senate recycling program. Now, offices on the fifth and sixth floors of the Hart Building, including my office, are participating in a pilot program that I hope will be expanded to the entire Congress by the end of the year.

We need to do more, though. In addition to sorting our garbage for recycling, we need to use as many recycled products as we can here in Congress. The House Clerk and Senate Secretary already provide our offices with many recycled paper products. The letterhead stationery that we all use is made of 50-percent recycled fibers, and the Senate Secretary is currently studying the use of recycled copier paper in Senate offices.

But we must ensure that we use recycled paper whenever possible in order to set an example for the rest of the Nation to follow. The bill I am introducing here today would require the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate to buy recycled paper and paper products whenever possible, assuming that the cost of such products is not excessive.

We in Congress can do our part to solve the impending garbage crisis by using recycled products. Efforts to promote recycling are being undertaken across the Nation, and it is important that we participate in these efforts.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2513

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

(a) PAPER PURCHASED BY CONGRESS.—(1) The Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate shall take such action as may be necessary to assure that recycled paper and paper products are used to the greatest extent practicable in the operations of the House of Representatives and the Senate, respectively. Any decision not to use recycled paper or paper products shall be based on a determination that such items are (A) not available, or (B) available only at an unreasonable price.

(2) In carrying out the requirement of paragraph (1), the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate shall, at a minimum, take such action as may be necessary to assure that recycled paper or paper products are purchased under each contract, or subcontract under a contract, for the procurement of 10,000 pounds or more of paper or paper products.

(b) PAPER PURCHASED FOR CONGRESSIONAL PURPOSES.—The Public Printer shall take such action as may be necessary to assure that, in providing printing and other services to the House of Representatives, the Government Printing Office uses recycled paper and paper products to the greatest extent practicable. (c) UNREASONABLE PRICE.—For purposes of this Act, an unreasonable price is one which exceeds by more than 10 percent the price of nonrecycled paper or paper products.

(d) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of this Act:

(1) The term "paper and paper products" includes printing and writing paper, corrugated boxes, napkins, tissue paper, and such other paper and paper products as may be considered necessary or appropriate to be included in such term by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Senate, or the Public Printer in implementing this Act.

(2) The term "recycled paper and paper products" means paper and paper products that contain the level of recovered material recommended by the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency in guidelines for Federal procurement of paper and paper products containing recovered materials, prepared pursuant to section 6002 of the solid Waste Disposal Act (42 U.S.C. 6962).

SEC. 3. ANNUAL REPORTS.

The Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate, in consultation with the Public Printer, shall each publish a report on the implementation of this Act in the House of Representatives and the Senate, respectively. Each report shall include information on the progress and problems associated with such implementation, and findings and recommendations with respect to such implementation.●

(A) the numerator of which is the total of the wages (within the meaning of section 209 of the Social Security Act) for service as a volunteer or volunteer leader under the Peace Corps Act of such individual credited for years before the calendar year in which the determination month occurs, up to the contribution and benefit base determined under section 230 of the Social Security Act (or other applicable maximum annual amount referred to in section 215(e)(1) of such Act) for each such year, and

(B) the denominator of which is the total of all wages described in subparagraph (A) of this subsection plus all other wages (within the meaning of section 209 of such Act) and all self-employment income (within the meaning of section 211(b) of such Act) of such individual credited for years after 1936 and before the calendar year in which the determination month occurs, up to the contribution and benefit base (or such other amount referred to in such section 215(e)(1) for each such year.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 provides a short title for the bill, the "Peace Corps Act Amendments of 1990".

Section 2 amends Section 3 of the Peace Corps Act (hereinafter the "Act") to authorize the appropriation of $181,061,000 to support the activities authorized by the Act in fiscal year 1991.

Section 3 amends provisions of title 5, United States Peace Code, relating to the Civil Service Retirement System and the Federal Employees Retirement System to correct a problem relating to the crediting of Peace Corps Volunteer service in the computation of federal retirement benefits. Section 5(f) of the Peace Corps Act, and section 8332(f)(5) of title 5, United States Code, authorize the crediting of periods of satisfactory Peace Corps Volunteer Service for federal retirement purposes if the Volunteer becomes a federal employee after his or her Volunteer service and later qualifies for federal civilian retirement benefits. Peace Corps Volunteer service is also made creditable service for purposes of Old Age and Survivors Insurance (Social Security) by 42 U.S.C. § 410(o).

However, 5 U.S.C. § 8832(j) requires that former Volunteers who are eligible for both Civil Service Retirement benefits and Social Security benefits cannot use the credit they earned through Peace Corps Volunteer service in computing the level of their Civil Service Retirement benefits. Thus, a retired federal employee who is eligible for Civil Service Retirement benefits, and also for Social Security benefits in any amount would have his or her federal pension reduced by the amount attributable to Peace Corps Volunteer service upon reaching age 62, the age of eligibility for Social Security benefits.

An identical exclusion, applicable to post-1956 military service, was eliminated in 1982 (Public Law 97-253, approved September 8, 1982), by permitting the employee to retain eligibility for Civil Service retirement benefits attributable to military service by making a deposit, with interest, to the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund. The amendment proposed would extend the same opportunity to former Peace Corps Volunteers.

Under the proposed amendment, a former Volunteer, at age 62, would be entitled to retain the credit already authorized by the Peace Corps Act for his or her volunteer service for Civil Service Retirement System purposes, or for Federal Employee Retirement System purposes, by making a deposit of an appropriate percentage of his or her Peace Corps readjustment allowance in the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund. Under 5 U.S.C. § 8332(f) only the Peace Corps Volunteer's readjustment allowance is deemed to be pay for CSRS purposes. Deposits made more than two years after the later of the date of enactment of the Peace Corps Act Amendments of 1990, or the date on which the former Volunteer first becomes eligible for participation in the CSRS or FERS would be required to include interest on the amount of the deposit compounded annually beginning on the date of expiration of the two-year grace period. The civil service retirement benefits payable to former Volunteers who elect Civil Service Retirement System benefits would be reduced by an amount of their Social Security benefits calculated on the basis of the ratio between their Peace Corps Volunteer service wages and their total Civil Service wages.

PEACE CORPS,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, DC, April 12, 1990.

Hon. DAN QUAYLE,
President of the Senate, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On behalf of the United States Peace Corps, I am pleased to propose legislation authorizing activities under the Peace Corps Act for fiscal year 1991.

These activities, carried out principally by Peace Corps Volunteers, advance the three basic goals of the Peace Corps Act: to help the peoples of interested countries and areas meet their needs for trained manpower, to help promote understanding of the American people by such peoples, and a better understanding of such peoples by the American people. In these ways, we can continue to advance the stated purpose of the Act, "to promote world peace and friendship."

The bill would authorize $181,061,000, the amount of the President's budget request, for fiscal year 1991.

Our proposed bill would also correct a retirement systems benefit problem which affects former Peace Corps Volunteers. Currently, former Volunteers eligible for old age benefits under the Civil Service Act lose, at age 62, the credit already authorized for volunteer service by the Peace Corps Act in computing civil service retirement benefits. The bill would rectify this inequity, placing former volunteers in a position similar to former members of the armed services.

We would appreciate your consideration and enactment of this proposal. The Office of Management and Budget advises that there is no objection to the presentation of this proposal to Congress and that its enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

PAUL D. COVERDELL,
Director, U.S. Peace Corps.●

By Mr. SIMON:

S. 2515. A bill to amend the Health Care Quality Improvement Act of 1986 to prohibit discrimination against international medical graduates, to provide for the establishment of a National Repository of Physician Records, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

INTERNATIONAL MEDICAL GRADUATES ANTI-DISCRIMINATION ACT

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the International Medical Graduates Anti-Discrimination Act. This act amends the Health Care Quality Improvement Act of 1986 and prohibits discrimination against international medical graduates, provides for the establishment of a National Repository of Physician Records, and establishes a licensing examination grant program.

International medical graduates have been an integral part of our health care system. They represent 22 percent of all physicians, and of the 123,000 international medical graduates, 48,000 are Board certified. Direct medical care is critical in our health care delivery system and 80 percent of international medical graduates provide this type of care. They also play an important role in the education and training of future physicians. Twenty percent of international medical graduates are on the staff of private or public teaching hospitals and universities and almost 50 percent of physicians at the National Institutes of Health are international medical graduates. It is important to recognize that international medical graduates are not comprised solely of foreign nationals since almost 29 percent of international medical graduates are U.S. citizens.

The treatment of international medical graduates has been a social injustice that we can no longer ignore. The elimination of discrimination must be our No. 1 goal and redressing the wrongs inflicted upon international medical graduates is one step toward that goal.

International medical graduates have found it difficult to practice in this country. The creation of the National Repository of Physician Records will provide international medical graduates with a structure that will facilitate licensing by endorsement. No longer will these physicians have to wait for months upon months for official records to arrive from their medical school which is continents away.

At present, international medical graduates are prohibited from taking the third part of the National Licensing Examination. Instead, they are required to take an alternate examination. This bill will eliminate the dual examination system. One exam will be administered to all medical graduates irrespective of where they received their medical degree.

Countless case studies have been documented describing the differential treatment provided to international medical graduates. We must end this double standard in which we rely so heavily upon international medical graduates to provide health care but treat them as second-class citizens.

The lack of access to health care in our society has been well documented and international medical graduates can be a valuable resource and be a part of the solution to our health care crisis. The access to health care can never come at the expense of quality of care to our citizens. Establishing requirements that are equal for both international medical graduates and domestically trained graduates can only lead to a health care system that provides both greater access and quality care to our citizens.

I call on my distinguished colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this act.●

By Mr. EXON (for himself, Mr. HATCH, and Mr. BINGAMAN):

S. 2516. A bill to augment and improve the quality of international data compiled by the Bureau of Economic Analysis under the International Investment and Trade in Service Survey Act by allowing that agency to share statistical establishment list information compiled by the Bureau of the Census, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

INTERNATIONAL DATA IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce on behalf of the Bush administration the Foreign Investment Analysis Act of 1990. Congressman NORM LENT, of New York, is also introducing identical legislation in the House of Representatives.

This legislation would improve the collection and analysis of information on foreign investment in the United States. I worked closely with the Reagan administration in reaching agreement on the Exon-Florio law which gave the President the power to investigate and if necessary stop a foreign purchase of an American company when such a transaction might threaten U.S. national security.

I am pleased to now work with the Bush administration to improve the Nation's analysis of data on foreign investment. It is crucial that policymakers in Congress and the administration have a clear, accurate, and useful picture of actual trends in foreign investment. Current data collection procedures on foreign investment present an incomplete and distorted picture of foreign ownership of U.S. assets.

This legislation would allow the Bureau of Economic Analysis [BEA] and the Bureau of the Census, both agencies of the U.S. Department of Commerce, to cooperate and share data to provide better information on foreign investment. The information would be used for statistical analysis and the confidentiality of data submitted to both agencies would be strictly protected.

Under current law, the Census Bureau collects and classifies information on all business enterprises and establishments operating in the United States and the BEA only collects and classifies information on foreign-owned enterprises. In other words, the BEA which has foreign investment analysis responsibilities within the Department of Commerce does not currently classify information about foreign businesses operating in the United States at the smaller, operational level; it only classifies information at the enterprise for parent company level.

To illustrate the current problem, a foreign oil company with chemical, electronics, and transportation businesses, for example, would be classified as a foreign oil company under current BEA practice. The Census Bureau, on the other hand, collects information at the more useful operational or establishment level and would classify each of the individual operations of the larger parent company as well as the primary business of the parent company.

The bills Congressman LENT and I are introducing on behalf of the Bush administration would give the BEA confidential access to the more useful information gathered by the Census Bureau. With such information access, the BEA will be able to give the Congress and the administration a much better understanding of the true nature of foreign ownership in the United States.

Once enacted and implemented, it would be possible to understand the true level of foreign ownership in various industries. To ensure that cooperation between BEA and Census Bureau does not compromise confidential information, the penalties for those who may violate the confidentiality requirements are increased.

The bill also requires the Secretary of Commerce to report to the Congress on the progress of the cooperation between the two agencies and to report on the accuracy of the analysis of the new data base.

Mr. President, I have repeatedly expressed my concern about America's growing dependence on foreign capital. At risk is America's economic independence.

The President recognized a similar concern in his 1991 budget transmission which stated that while foreign capital inflows cushioned U.S. domestic investment and helped sustain growth, foreign capital is "a second-best solution in comparison with increasing domestic saving." The budget statement continues, "when foreign savers provide capital, the future interest and dividend returns flow abroad rather than providing income for Americans."

The Bush administration is to be congratulated for its frank assessment of foreign investment issues in its budget and for its admission that the data presently available on the level of foreign ownership in the United States is not as good as it could be.

The Foreign Investment Analysis Act of 1990 is a constructive addition to the debate on the role that foreign ownership should play in the U.S. economy. Some suggest that Americans should simply be grateful for their jobs at foreign-owned businesses. I say that jobs are not enough. While American economic policy certainly should be concerned about the creation of jobs, it must also be concerned about the creation of American wealth.

A better understanding of the level of foreign ownership will help the Congress and President better craft economic policy. Among the policies encouraged by the public's concern about the increasing level of foreign investment could be a better use of the Exon-Florio law, stronger efforts to reduce the Federal budget deficit, a more aggressive U.S. technology policy, and broad efforts to increase U.S. competitiveness.

Mr. President, I understand that some of my colleagues may wish to do more in this area. Senators MURKOWSKI and HARKIN have also done excellent work on this issue. The bill I introduce today represents what the Bush administration is willing to do. I am hopeful that this bill will come to represent a consensus position on this important matter. I look forward to working with my colleagues and the Bush administration to enact this needed legislation.

Mr. President, I encourage my colleagues to join me in support of the Foreign Investment Analysis Act of 1990.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at the conclusion of my remarks and properly referred.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I am pleased to cosponsor S. 2516 with my colleague from Nebraska, Senator EXON.

This amendment accomplishes three major goals commonly associated with good public policy practices:

It encourages the exchange of data that is necessary for improving the ability of our Government to manage the economy, and therefore has been called a good government measure.

It can also be called a good planning measure because it helps us to understand the full availability of foreign and domestic investment capital in the United States; and

It is a good faith measure because it requires our foreign partners to disclose nothing more than the types of information reported to major foreign governments by American firms operating abroad. Nor does it impose any added reporting burdens on foreign companies in the United States. The measure tells Census to share its data with BEA.

The Commerce Department's Bureau of Economic Analysis and the Census Bureau separately collect information on investments by foreign firms in American companies that amount to a holding of at least 10-percent equity. But, Mr. President, the two organizations cannot share these data with each other.

Imagine the improvement of our own governance functions, in Congress and in the executive branch, by having better analyses that the creation of this data linkage would provide. This is why it is a good government measure.

The analyses are what make it a good planning measure. We can determine the industries on which foreign investment is focused. This is not to generate fear or panic, as many suggest, but rather to emphasize in our own industrial development planning which sectors of the economy require more or less public policy attention.

But there is also a fairness element in the measure which I will not deny, nor should we deny it. Part of the fair trade argument is that our partners demand no more of American firms than what this country demands of theirs. This does not mean that we want foreign firms to disclose such business information as trade secrets, marketing strategy, or emerging product innovations.

It does mean, however, that we know in which technologies foreign investments are concentrated. Since BEA data tend to focus on investment in highly diversified organizations in the United States, we cannot tell which profit center, division, or suborganizations element of the whole corporate organization is benefiting from foreign investment.

Nor should we ignore the importance of having reliable investment data as the world's trade patterns shift. For example, since January of this year, the Tokyo stock market, the so-called cash fountain for much of Japan's overseas investment funds, has lost 30 percent of value, or $1.4 trillion. This means that we will see some short-term, and possibly long-term, decline in Japanese investment in the United States. We should know where the declines occur, as well as the industrial sectors that may even face a possible repatriation of Japanese moneys—a trend that some economists are already predicting.

The value of this bill cannot be underestimated. Our trade relations will improve; there will be less suspicion of the motives of our partners. Our ability to formulate plans to make the difficult transition from an economy heavily dependent on defense to one that is more commercially attuned will be facilitated. And, above all, full and open disclosure, without prejudice, is a strength of the American system. It is the type of strength that brings foreign investment to our country.

By Mr. LEVIN:

S. 2517. A bill to provide that any distribution permitted under the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to a first time home buyer from the individual retirement account of the home buyer, or the home buyer's parents or grandparents be free from the 10-percent penalty for early distributions; to the Committee on Finance.

PENALTY FREE WITHDRAWALS FROM IRA'S FOR FIRST-TIME HOME BUYERS

● Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, it is likely this year that legislation will be enacted to allow first-time home buyers to withdraw money from their individual retirement accounts for the purchase of a home without being subject to a 10-percent penalty for early withdrawal. I am a cosponsor of legislation introduced by Senator BENTSEN to accomplish that goal. I believe this legislation would offer an additional approach to surmounting the high hurdles that now exist to home ownership.

However, this legislation can be made even more effective if the Internal Revenue Code also provided that the exemption from the 10-percent penalty would cover not only distributions from the IRA's of the first-time home buyers themselves, but also from the IRA's of their parents and grandparents. The legislation which I am introducing today would broaden the exemption from the 10-percent penalty to individual retirement accounts of the parents and grandparents of the first-time home buyer.

This modification is important because the reality is that many first-time home buyers will not have accumulated enough in their own IRA's to make a substantial dent in meeting downpayment costs associated with the purchase of a house. By expanding to parents and grandparents the pool of IRA's that can be dipped into to help first-time home buyers without a penalty for early withdrawal, this legislation opens up a new avenue of home financing. In light of the increasing obstacles to home ownership that many first-time home buyers are encountering, this legislation would provide them with one more tool to overcome those difficulties. For the person or family which is looking to afford its own home, having the tools to finance the purchase of the house are as important as were the tools to people who built the house in the first place.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation be printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2517

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Paragraph (2) of section 72(t) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to 10 percent additional tax on early distributions from qualified retirement plans) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(E) Payments to first-time homebuyers. Any distribution permitted under this section to a first time homebuyer from the qualified retirement plan of the homebuyer, or the homebuyer's parents or grandparents."●

S. 2518. A bill to direct the Director of the General Services Administration to make paper with recycled content available to the Secretary of Agriculture and for the Secretary of Agriculture to establish a pilot program within the Forest Service for the use of paper with recycled content; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

NATIONAL FOREST RECYCLED PAPER ACT

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to direct the General Services Administration to make paper with recycled content available to the Secretary of Agriculture for use by the Forest Service.

It is a disturbing fact that 5 billion acres of the Earth's forest have been cut and not replaced. What makes this fact even more disturbing is that most of this destruction has occurred in this century. We all know that forests provide many benefits and this trend must be reversed.

Fortunately, trees are a renewable resource and paper can be recycled. I believe we must take the challenge and encourage measures which will improve forest conservation and the use of recycled paper products.

I have always considered the USDA Forest Service as a leader in forest conservation. As a part of this leadership role a forest in my home State of New Mexico, the Carson National Forest, recently proposed using recycled paper for their general office operations. To my surprise this proposal was denied by the General Services Administration which would not allow the forest to purchase recycled paper.

There is obviously a problem when the Agency directed to conserve the Nation's forests is not allowed to utilize recycled paper. The bill I have introduced today will authorize the Forest Service to purchase and use recycled paper as a pilot test program for 1 year. At the end of 1 year the General Services Adminstration will report to Congress on the results of the pilot program and the opportunity to expand the program governmentwide.

I also have written to the Director of the General Services Administration asking for him to clarify the Agency's position on purchasing recycled paper. It would be preferable if the Agency would take the lead on offering recycled paper without legislation. I have recommended that the General Services Administration use the standard guidelines for recycled paper which the Environmental Protection Agency has already established.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this bill be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "National Forest Recycled Paper Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) one-third of the earth's forests, 5,000,000,000 acres, have been cut and not replaced;

(2) each man, woman and child in the United States annually uses enough paper and packaging to equal 7 trees;

(3) paper with recycled content is available for many types of uses;

(4) while many people have begun to recycle paper, a stronger market needs to be developed for the use of paper with recycled content;

(5) the General Services Administration does not offer or allow the purchase of paper with recycled content;

(6) the mission of the Forest Service is to manage and conserve forests for the future generations; and

(7) the Forest Service should be a leader in the use of recycled paper because of their leadership role in the forestry conservation.

SEC. 3. PILOT PROJECT AND REPORT BY THE GENERAL SERVICES ADMINISTRATION.

(a) PILOT PROJECT.—

(1) For a period of one year, the Director of the General Services Administration shall make available to the Secretary of Agriculture paper with varying amounts of recycled content for all standard uses. If available, other departments and agencies of the Government may also request to use paper with recycled content and purchase this paper through the General Services Administration.

(2) The Secretary of Agriculture, acting through the Chief of the Forest Service, shall use paper with recycled content for paperwork and printing during the one-year project authorized by this subsection.

(b) REPORT.—At the end of the one year authorized by subsection (a), the Director of the General Services Administration shall report back to the Congress on the results of the pilot program and the opportunity to expand the program governmentwide. Included in the report shall be an assessment from the Chief of the Forest Service describing environmental benefits of the pilot project.

SEC. 4. AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.

There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as are necessary to carry out this Act.●

S. 2519. A bill to require the U.S. Marshals Service to designate court districts that need additional private entities for the detention of Federal prisoners and to provide certain standards for such entities; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REGULATION OF PRIVATE DETENTION FACILITIES USED BY THE UNITED STATES MARSHALS

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce Federal legislation that would regulate private jails that are utilized by the U.S. Marshals Service.

Clearly, we have a responsibility to provide sufficient jail space for those who break our laws. However, before any new jails are constructed they should meet two requirements.

First, all new jails need to go through a rigorous analysis to determine the need for the jail. Second, jails—whether they are publicly or privately constructed—need to meet certain standards to protect the public.

I became concerned about this issue after a company proposed to build a private jail in my State. After reviewing the matter, it seemed to me that the proposed private jail has not met these two requirements.

It appears that this jail is being built for speculative purposes without a clear determination of the need for the jail. The builders of this jail intend to contract with the U.S. Marshals Service to house Federal detainees. However, I received conflicting information from the Marshals Service on whether they would have an interest in using the jail. Before any jail is constructed for Federal prisoners in New Mexico or any other State, the Federal Government should determine whether such a facility is needed.

There are no applicable Federal standards that would govern this proposed private jail.

Under 18 U.S.C. 4013(a)(3), which was enacted as section of the 7608(d)(1) of Public Law 100-690—the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, the Marshals Service is authorized to house Federal detainees in private jails. Section 4013, however, provides no standards for private jails. The Marshals Service currently is seeking space in private jails in Boston and Kansas City. In these two cases, the standards will be set by a contract between the Marshals Service and the private jail before the jail is constructed.

The proposed jail in New Mexico is different. In that case, the jail will apparently be built first and then the builder will seek to enter into a contract with the Marshals Service. The public needs to be assured, prior to the construction of a jail, that adequate safeguards will be put in place to protect the public.

Mr. President, the bill that I am introducing today would amend section 4013 to correct these problems.

The bill will require the Marshals Service to determine whether there is a need for additional jail space in a particular area and will permit the Marshals Service to contract for jail space only in areas where there is a need. This will curb the building of jails for speculative purposes.

The bill also would permit the Marshals Service to enter into contracts only with private jails that meet strict standards designed to protect public safety. Under the bill, private jails with which the Marshals Service contracts, must:

First, meet the standards of the American Correctional Association;

Second, have approved fire, security, escape, and riot plans;

Third, comply with all applicable State and local laws and regulations; and Fourth, comply with any other regulations that the Marshals Service deems appropriate.

Mr. President, this bill will assure, if any private jails are built to house Federal prisoners, that they are needed and that they are constructed with adequate safeguards to protect the public.

Representative STEVE SCHIFF, who represents the district in which the private jail would be constructed, shares my concerns about this facility. He is introducing identical legislation in the House of Representatives today. I am pleased that Senator BINGAMAN is cosponsoring this bill.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be inserted in the RECORD immediately following my remarks.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2519

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 4013 of title 18, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(b)(1) The United States Marshals Service may designate districts that need additional support from private detention entities under subsection (a)(3) based on—

"(A) the number of Federal detainees in the district; and

"(B) the availability of Federal, State, and local government detention facilities.

"(2) In order to be eligible for a contract for the housing, care, and security of persons held in custody of the United States Marshal pursuant to Federal law and funding under subsection (a)(3), a private entity shall—

"(A) be located in a district that has been designated as needing additional Federal detention facilities pursuant to paragraph (1);

"(B) meet the standards of the American Correctional Association;

"(C) comply with all applicable State and local laws and regulations;

"(D) have approved fire, security, escape, and riot plans; and

"(E) comply with any other regulations that the Marshals Service deems appropriate.

"(3) The United States Marshals Service shall provide an opportunity for public comment on a contract under subsection (a)(3).".●

By Mr. CHAFEE (for himself, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. DECONCINI, and Mr. CRANSTON):

S. 2520. A bill to establish permanent Federal and State drug treatment programs for criminal offenders, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

DRUG REHABILITATION AND RECOVERY PROGRAM FOR PRISONS

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, today Senator MOYNIHAN and I are introducing the Drug Rehabilitation and Recovery Program for Prisons Act. We are joined by Senator JEFFORDS, Senator D'AMATO, and Senator DECONCINI in introducing this bill. This legislation will establish comprehensive drug treatment and rehabilitation programs in Federal and State prisons.

Over the past 2 years the Senate has avidly debated the drug problem. Yet, there is one issue that Congress has failed to address adequately—the availability of rehabilitation programs in State and Federal prisons.

Congress has been working to solve the prison overcrowding problem by increasing funds for prison construction. I agree that we need more prison beds, and have been supportive of these efforts. Nonetheless, we must recognize that part of the prison overcrowding problem can be attributed to repeat offenders. Many are released from prison only to return again to patterns of criminal behavior—a phenomenon known as recidivism. One of the primary causes of recidivism is crime directly and indirectly caused by addiction to drugs. Thus, part of the solution lies in breaking this cycle of crime by providing comprehensive drug rehabilitation programs in State and Federal prisons.

Drug-related crimes have overwhelmed our criminal justice system. To illustrate my point, let me share some startling statistics:

In Washington DC, in 1985, 25 out of 148 homicides were drug related. In 1988, 225 out of 372 homicides were drug related. That is a 43-percent increase.

In a 1980 study, on the average, heroin addicts committed crimes 178 days per year, primarily to support their habit.

Nearly one of every four black men between the ages of 20 and 29 is currently behind bars or on probation or parole.

Of 2,000 arrestees who tested for drug use in 12 cities, between 53 and 79 percent tested positive for illicit drugs in the 24 to 48 hours after their arrest.

According to the President's National Drug Control Strategy, 50 percent of Federal prisoners and nearly 80 percent of State prisoners have used drugs or are addicted to drugs.

Recidivism appears to be linked to drug abuse among many offenders. One study found that 62 percent of the approximately 100,000 inmates released in 11 States were arrested again within 3 years—41 percent actually returned to prison. Of those originally arrested on drug offenses, 50 percent were arrersted again within 3 years of their release.

Currently, counseling programs are available in all 54 Federal prisons, but few prisons provide intensive treatment programs. The compromise drug funding agreement we reached last year increased the Federal prison funding level by over $1 billion, bringing the total to about $2.5 billion for 1990 which the President had requested. The agreement, however, did not specifically designate an amount for drug treatment for Federal prisons. In fact, it is estimated that only $6 million will be spent on drug treatment this year—that is only 0.25 percent of the total allocation to the Bureau of Prisons.

Several States have begun to implement drug rehabilitation programs in their correctional facilities. One program worth noting is the 14-year-old Stay'n Out Program in New York which has been extremely successful in rehabilitating inmates and reducing the rate of recidivism. Independent studies have shown an 80-percent success rate—8 out of 10 inmates who complete the program are not arrested again, do not use drugs, and do not commit more crimes after being released.

The Drug Rehabilitation and Recovery Program for Prisons Act would establish a comprehensive drug treatment program within Federal prisons administered by the Attorney General. It would authorize $25 million to accomplish this task.

At the State level, this legislation would establish two grant programs within the Department of Health and Human Services—the first would provide funding for States to establish drug treatment programs in prisons, and the second would provide similar grants for drug rehabilitation programs for juvenile offenders.

Drug rehabilitation programs in both State and Federal prisons which receive grant money must include: the evaluation and assessments of each participant after he or she voluntarily chooses to undergo treatment; different levels of treatment that rehabilitate the participant's attitude, behavior, and lifestyle; coordination with other human service programs such as educational and job training programs; and posttreatment assistance which discourages participants from returning to patterns of criminal behavior.

In addition, our legislation would restrict the ability of the Attorney General and States to provide early release to certain inmates who have successfully completed a drug rehabilitation program funded by this proposal. Early release may not be provided to violent criminals, and parole must be revoked if the inmate does not remain drug free. In addition, inmates must have served at least three-fourths of the time at which they become eligible for parole before they may be released.

The criminal justice system currently does little to rehabilitate inmates—many just get out of jail, commit additional crimes, and return to jail. Inmate rehabilitation alone will not solve the prison overcrowding problem. However, programs that reduce the rate of recidivism must be an essential component of a cost-effective solution. Without drug rehabilitation programs in prisons we will continue to release hardened criminals into our communities to sell drugs to our children and rob our homes for money to buy drugs.

I urge my colleagues to consider the importance of rehabilitating inmates addicted to drugs before they are returned to society and support this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that 11 letters of endorsement, a summary of the bill and the bill itself be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Authorization level: $25 million.

II. GRANTS FOR DRUG TREATMENT IN STATE PRISONS

The Secretary may award a start-up grant of up to $100,000 to a state to develop a treatment plan and apply for the implementation grant. The State plan must meet the drug treatment program criteria described below to be eligible for the implementation grant. The amount of a State's grant award cannot exceed:

75 percent of the drug treatment program in the first year;

50 percent in the second year;

25 percent in the third and fourth years; and

Authorization level: $40 million.

39-059 O-91-17 (Pt. 6)

III. GRANTS FOR DRUG TREATMENT OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS

The Secretary of HHS through the Administrator of ADAHMA shall award grants to States for the establishment and implementation of drug treatment programs for juvenile offenders. The Secretary may award a start-up grant of up to $100,000 to a state to develop a treatment plan and apply for the implementation grant. The State plan must meet the drug treatment program criteria described below to be eligible for the implementation grant. The amount of a State's grant award cannot exceed:

75 percent of the drug treatment program in the first year;

50 percent in the second year;

25 percent in the third and fourth years; and

25 percent in each of the next five years, if the Secretary approves.

Authorization level: $10 million.

IV. DRUG TREATMENT PROGRAM CRITERIA

1. Voluntary Participation—participation in the drug treatment program must be voluntary. To the greatest extent possible, the program must make services available to all inmates and juvenile offenders who request treatment. However, the head of a drug treatment program may determine that resources would be better spent on others awaiting treatment (after reasonable efforts are made to counsel and provide treatment) if an individual is not susceptible to treatment or if that individual's disruptive conduct interferes with the treatment of others.

2. Identification—drug treatment program must make reasonable efforts to identify inmates and juvenile offenders who have used drugs and who might benefit from treatment and encourage such individuals to seek treatment at the earliest point of entrance into the criminal justice system or incarceration. This bill does not encourage involuntary drug testing or treatment (except with regard to participation in the early release program).

3. Evaluation of inmate—drug treatment program shall conduct an evaluation and assessment of each inmate or juvenile offender within 30 days after such an individual expresses the desire to receive treatment. The assessment should determine the appropriate course and timing of the treatment. A further assessment must be completed on each individual that completes or ceases treatment to determine the best course for post-treatment.

4. The program must include—education services, counseling, self-help and peer group activities, short-term isolated unit activities, and long-term residential treatment services including therapeutic communities. The program should, to the extent possible, separate those undergoing treatment from the general population of the facility during and after treatment. Treatment provided by a program must address the physiological and emotional pathologies of the individual treated, including rehabilitation of the attitude, behavior, and lifestyle of the individual. The program must be coordinated with local law enforcement officials and must provide funds for rehabilitation in local settings that is continuous and compatible with regard to rehabilitation in state or federal prisons. The program must take into account the most recent successful drug treatment and correctional facilities programs.

5. Post-Treatment assistance—must be provided for at least 1 year for individuals choosing to continue care, and must be coordinated with other human service and rehabilittion programs, such as education and job training programs.

6. Training—a drug treatment program must provide for the training of both drug treatment program staff and correctional officers in treatment techniques and in the handling of inmates and juvenile offenders who are drug users. The staff should include qualified physicians, psychologists, and substance abuse counselors.

V. RESTRICTIONS ON EARLY RELEASE OF QUALIFIED DRUG DEPENDENT OFFENDERS

The Attorney General, with regard to the Federal drug treatment program, and a State, with regard to a drug treatment program grant, are restricted from providing for the early release of qualified drug dependent offenders, unless the following conditions are met:

1. If a court reduces an inmates prison term, the court must also impose a period of supervised release of the individual for at least one year;

2. Eligibility for early supervised release may only be granted to an individual who has:

Served at least three fourths of the time he or she would be eligible for parole.

Not been convicted of murder, attempted murder, kidnapping, assault with a deadly weapon, espionage, rape or attempted rape.

Not been sentenced to life in prison.

Has successfully completed, while incarcerated, a drug treatment program.

Received approval for early supervised release from the sentencing judge;

4. The released individual must reside in a half-way house in which intensive counseling and supervision is available for at least six months;

5. The released individual must submit to periodic urine drug testing at least once every 60 days, regularly attend meetings of support groups, and participate in a outpatient substance abuse counseling program;

6. Drug Testing must be conducted in accordance with the requirements and procedures prescribed by the Secretary of HHS consistent with the Mandatory Guidelines on Federal Employee Drug Testing Programs.

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF CRIMINAL DEFENSE LAWYERS,
Washington, DC, April 17, 1990.

Hon. DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: On behalf of the 20,000 members of the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers and its state and local affiliates, I am pleased to convey to you our support for the legislation to be introduced shortly by Senator Chafee and you regarding drug treatment in state and federal prisons.

We applaud the legislation for including not only treatment services, but significant follow-up services as well, including counseling and peer group activities, and one year of post-treatment care coordinated with other human service and rehabilitation programs, such as educational and job training programs. Such provisions offer hope not only of getting the drug-dependent offender off drugs, but of keeping him or her off drugs, by addressing the causes of the addictive behavior and seeking to turn the offender to more productive pursuits after his or her encounter with the criminal justice system.

We commend your leadership and vision in seeking to move the debate toward constructive long-term solutions to the nation's drug problem. We welcome the growing recognition in Congress that drug policies which emphasize punishment "above all" (as in the latest ONDCP strategy, at p. 9) are both unproductive and exhorbitantly expensive.

If there is anything that the members of the criminal defense bar can do to assist in promoting such real and contructive measures to reduce the harm to society caused by drugs, please do not hesitate to contact me.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

H. SCOTT WALLACE,
Legislative Director.

AMERICAN CORRECTIONAL ASSOCIATION,
Laurel, MD, April 17, 1990.

Hon. DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: Please accept our support of the language regarding the drug treatment bill which is due to be introduced by Senator Chafee later this week. We are encouraged to see such language and appropriation for treatment that is so desperately needed in our prisons and for aftercare.

Recent studies reflect that as many as 85 percent of our prisoners upon intake report prior substance abuse. Without intervention and treatment we will never break this cycle of addiction.

Thank you for your support in co-sponsoring this very important and vital legislation.

Peace,

ANTHONY TRAVISONO,
Executive Director.

THE CRIMINAL JUSTICE POLICY FOUNDATION,
Washington, DC, April 24, 1990.

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: I am writing to lend my enthusiastic support to the legislation you are co-sponsoring with Senator Chafee authorizing federal funds for drug treatment programs in federal and state prisons, as well as in juvenile correctional facilities.

I believe that such programs are absolutely necessary to break the cycle of addition, poverty and joblessness for so many of our young men and women who are incarcerated for drug law offenses. It is essential that prisoners are given access to comprehensive treatment services that will enable them to return to their communities with the necessary skills to resist a return to drug addiction. Otherwise, their stay in prison only ensures high rates of recidivism.

Again, I applaud your efforts to break the cycle of drug addiction among those who are incarcerated and support your legislation to funds treatments programs to serve them.

Sincerely,

ERIC E. STERLING.

CITIZENS UNITED FOR REHABILITATION OF ERRANTS,
Washington, DC, April 25, 1990.

Senators JOHN H. CHAFEE and DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATORS CHAFEE AND MOYNIHAN, Drug treatment behind the walls is a necessary and effective means of reducing recidivism. The National Institute of Justice reports that rates as low as 16 percent have been achieved through in-prison treatment programs. 50 percent or higher is usually the recidivism rate for those not receiving treatment.

Thus, CURE enthusiastically endorses the legislation that Senators Chafee and Moynihan will be introducing.

Through this legislation, funds will be provided to correctional facilities to set up innovative treatment programs behind the walls. We are convinced that every dollar spent will be returned at least ten-fold in savings in crime-reduction and in the building of more prisons. This does not take into account the human costs in terms of the victims and the offender and their families.

Congratulations to Senators Chafee and Moynihan for their leadership on this most important piece of legislation.

Sincerely,

CHARLES SULLIVAN,
Executive Director.

Re the Drug Rehabilitation and Recovery Program for Prisons.

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: By means of this letter I wish to express my support for the Federal Drug Rehabilitation and Recovery Program for Prisons. It is clear to me as a member of the local criminal justice system that drugs play a significant part in our rising crime rate. I am convinced that if we have a chance to get control of our serious drug problem then we must consider more treatment for offenders.

I believe that your senate bill which will allow federal and state prisons to identify and treat prisoners who have drug problems is an important first step in winning the war on drugs. I hope that you are successful in convincing Congress of the importance of this type of legislation.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

PAUL J. CARMOUCHE,
District Attorney.

TENTH JUDICIAL CIRCUIT,

Re Prison Drug Treatment Program.

Senator DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: I have been advised that yourself and Senator Chafee are preparing to introduce legislation which would require drug treatment programs in federal and state prisons. I am writing in support of such legislation and to applaud your efforts in this area.

Having been associated with this office since 1972, I have seen the tremendous increase in the drug problem that we face in this country. I also regretfully have witnessed the lack of response to treatment of individuals who have drug dependencies. Too many people feel that our drug problem is something that we can solve through law enforcement alone, but anyone who is associated with law enforcement knows that that is a myth. We must have some meaningful treatment programs for people who find themselves incarcerated as a result of crimes committed in support of their drug habits.

I hope that you are successful in your efforts for this new program in that I sincerely feel that treatment of drug dependency will be a giant step towards our solving our crime problem in this country. If I can be of further assistance or support in this matter, please do not hesitate to call on me.

Very truly yours,

DAVID BARBER,
District Attorney.

PORTLAND OR,

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: This letter is written in support of the Drug Rehabilitation and Recovery Program for Prisons Bill co-sponsored by you and Senator Chafee.

As District Attorney for the most populous county in the state of Oregon and where over 40% of the crime in the state occurs, I can attest to the prevalence of drug use among the offender population. A large percentage of those who go to federal and state prisons could benefit from participation in a rehabilitation and recovery program while incarcerated.

Very truly yours,

MICHAEL D. SCHRUNK,
District Attorney.

WEST PALM BEACH, FL,
April 16, 1990.

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: It is my understanding that you are co-sponsoring a Bill to be introduced by Senator Chafee related to drug treatment in federal and state prisons. The need for drug treatment programs in our penal institutions is critical, and your Bill deserves favorable and swift action. The impact of drugs and the inability of our institutions to provide treatment for drug offenders has created the enormous repeat cost to the citizens of the United States. I am not convinced that any drug program will reach the varied abused substances and those who abuse them. It is, however, necessary for us to move forward to separate the various drug and narcotic substances so that we can individualize the treatment and find out what works for the greatest number of abusers.

I urge your colleagues to join with you and Senator Chafee in passing this Bill and seeing that it is implemented at the earliest possible time.

Sincerely,

DAVID H. BLUDWORTH.

DIVISION OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE,

Re The Drug Rehabilitation And Recovery Program For Prisons.

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: The Division of Criminal Justice supports your proposal to provide for drug treatment in federal prisons for inmates convicted of federal crimes.

The "War on Drugs" must be fought on all fronts: enforcement, prosecution, education and treatment. People convicted of crime, who are incarcerated, who have a drug problem and who genuinely seek drug treatment should be afforded the opportunity of obtaining such treatment.

One section of the proposal—restrictions on early release—should be amended to exclude from early release those persons convicted of selling drugs or possessing drugs with intent to sell or distribute. Drug dealers should not be eligible for early release.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. KELLY,
Chief State's Attorney.

OFFICE OF THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY,
COUNTY OF VENTURA, STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
April 17, 1990.

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: I would like to add my endorsement to the legislation which you and Senator Chafee are sponsoring to provide drug treatment in state and federal prisons, as well as for juvenile offenders. The legislation addresses a largely unmet need to provide drug treatment for convicted offenders with drug problems.

It is clear there is a direct correlation between drug abuse and overall criminal activity. A reduction in drug abuse, results in a reduction of overall crime on both an individual and a community level. This bill targets proven criminals who are users. If the treatment programs provided for by this legislation are successful, the level of recidivism of these offenders should be reduced.

I support your efforts to pass this legislation, with the belief that the program it provides could help reduce drug usage and therefore criminal activity by convicted offenders upon their release.

Very truly yours,

MICHAEL D. BRADBURY,
District Attorney.

PORTLAND, OR,

Hon. DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: This letter is written in support of the Drug Rehabilitation and Recovery Program for Prisons Bill co-sponsored by you and Senator Chafee.

As District Attorney for the most populous county in the state of Oregon and where over 40% of the crime in the state occurs, I can attest to the prevalence of drug use among the offender population. A large percentage of those who go to federal and state prisons could benefit from participation in a rehabilitation and recovery program while incarcerated.

Very truly yours,

MICHAEL D. SCHRUNK,
District Attorney.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleague and friend from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE] as an original cosponsor of proposed legislation which will expand the availability of and access to drug treatment in our Nation's prisons and correctional facilities.

On June 15, 1989, I introduced, with the cosponsorship of Senators D'AMATO, NUNN, DECONCINI, and CRANSTON, a bill S. 1193, the Drug Dependent Offender Rehabilitation Act of 1989, which sought to expand drug treatment in our Federal prison facilities. In addition to expanding our commitment to drug-abuse treatment in the Federal prison system we also sought to establish a special program of supervised release for nonviolent inmates who complete treatment.

Today, Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator CHAFEE to expand not only our commitment to drug treatment in Federal prisons but also in our State and local prisons and jails for both adult as well as juvenile offenders.

We all know too well the impact drugs have had on our institutions including, most particularly, our prisons. We have heard much alarming news on this floor about overcrowding in our prison facilities. As I reported last year on January 1, 1988, Federal prisons housed 43,946 inmates, 62 percent above their planned capacity of 26,473.

Our prisons face a problem greater than overcrowding. To wit: recidivism. According to the Bureau of Prisons, 43 percent of all Federal prisoners are rearrested within 3 years of release. It is safe to assume that even more than 43 percent commit crimes for which they are not arrested or imprisoned. Recidivism is even greater in State prisons. According to Justice Department statistics, 63 percent of State prisoners are rearrested within 3 years. Recidivism rates are failure rates. Our prison system has done precious little good for society when criminals arrested for selling heroin in 1982 return to the streets in 1988 only to start selling crack. Instead of rehabilitation, what we are left with is an endless cycle of arrest, prosecution, jail, and rearrest.

There is a simple explanation for much of this tragic state of affairs. Forty-three percent of incoming Federal inmates are self-described substance abusers. The numbers for local prisons are, once again, more startling. Eighty percent of male arrestees in New York and 67 percent of male arrestees in Washington test positive for drugs. Few of them are arrested for personal use of illegal drugs, but most are arrested for activities associated with drug use. Drug dealing. Drug smuggling. Robbery. Burglary. Prison, indeed, punishment of any kind, is not likely to deter such crimes when they are committed to support addiction—a drug habit which is in fact a disease of the brain.

Senator CHAFEE's bill, which incorporates the legislation I introduced last year, would provide $75 million for drug treatment in our Nation's correctional facilities, and for postrelease followup programs. Effective drug treatment in prison has been demonstrated to reduce recidivism. A May 1989 study on correctional treatment programs in Oregon revealed that 74 percent of inmates who completed an inpatient drug treatment program in prison had not returned to prison 3 years after release. The inmates who went through the program were hardened criminals. On average, they had been arrested 14 times and spent 7 years in prison. On average, they first used drugs when they were 12½ years old.

Mr. President, we cannot just discard these individuals. We have an opportunity to provide alternatives to those offenders who resolve to end the cycle of addiction and crime. Let us make the most of this opportunity.

We are in receipt of letters of support from various groups and individuals who support our efforts including the American Correctional Association, the National Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers, the Criminal Justice Policy Foundation, Citizens United for Rehabilitation of Errants, and a number of district attorney offices from around the country all of which will appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

By Mr. BINGAMAN (for himself and Mr. DOMENICI):

S. 2521. A bill to exchange certain lands in the State of New Mexico and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

COCHITI LAND EXCHANGE ACT OF 1990

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator DOMENICI, I am introducing the Cochiti Land Exchange Act of 1990. This bill has several valuable purposes worthy of comment. First, the bill provides for a land exchange that brings within the Federal system another small piece of the spectacular Baca property in New Mexico. This area is a combination of some of the world's most intriguing geology and beautiful scenery and its partial acquisition for future generations is an important result of this bill.

Second, this bill provides for further study of the remainder of the Baca for future Federal acquisition. This 3-year effort by the National Forest Service is a necessary prelude to future discussions on the Baca.

Third, this exchange corrects a longstanding wrong by the Federal Government. In 1966, at the request of the Federal Government, the owners of the Baca gave the Forest Service land in the Baca in return for a tract of land between Albuquerque and Santa Fe. Subsequently, other departments of the Federal Government questioned the title given to the Baca owners by the Forest Service. The Forest Service, in correspondence to the New Mexico congressional delegation, has noted that the Baca owners "were treated unfairly by the Federal Government, albeit by different Agencies." In addition to the individual wrong involved, the Forest Service is concerned that the action "leaves open to question whether the United States will stand by its land conveyances and puts into question the efficacy of the Forest Service's land exchange program." Fortunately, the exchange provision and other sections in this bill correct not only the individual wrong to the owners of the Baca, but also reestablish the integrity of the Forest Service's Land Exchange Program.

I encourage my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. BINGAMAN:

S. 2522. A bill to require Congress to purchase recycled paper and paper products to the greatest extent practicable; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

CONGRESSIONAL RECYCLING ACT

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation which would require the House of Representatives and the Senate to use recycled paper and paper products in their operations.

We are all aware of the importance of conserving natural resources. Recycling of those resources is one of the most important ways to support conservation. The most obvious and easiest ways to encourage recycling is through the use of recycled paper.

For recycling to be successful, there must be a supply of paper to recycle and there must be a demand for the product. At this point, we have become efficient at supplying paper for recycling; however, we have not supported the demand side of the equation through the use of recycled products. We must show a commitment to use recycled paper.

A number of us in the Senate have initiated a program in our offices to recycle all of the paper used in the office. This program shows that it is not difficult to separate paper products and begin the recycling process.

The Senate will soon consider important legislation to increase and improve the forested areas of the Nation through tree planting and forestry conservation measures. In addition to directly supporting forestry conservation measures, we need to start using recycled products.

Mr. President, I believe we must set the example on the use of recycled products. To further strengthen the Government's position on the use of recycled paper products, I plan to introduce legislation later this week which will require the General Services Administration to make recycled paper available to the Secretary of Agriculture for use by the Forest Service, the leader in forestry conservation.

I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of this bill be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2522

(a) PAPER PURCHASED BY CONGRESS.—(1) The Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate shall take such action as may be necessary to assure that recycled paper and paper products are used to the greatest extent practicable in the operations of the House of Representatives and the Senate, respectively. Any decision not to use recycled paper or paper products shall be based on a determination that such items are (A) not available, or (B) available only at an unreasonable price.

(2) In carrying out the requirement of paragraph (1), the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate shall, at a minimum, take such action as may be necessary to assure that recycled paper or paper products are purchased under each contract, or subcontract under a contract, for the procurement of 10,000 pounds or more of paper or paper products.

(b) PAPER PURCHASED FOR CONGRESSIONAL PURPOSES.—The Public Printer shall take such action as may be necessary to assure that, in providing printing and other services to the House of Representatives, the Government Printing Office uses recycled paper and paper products to the greatest extent practicable. By Mr. NICKLES:

S. 2523. A bill to provide for a reasonable management program for agricultural wetlands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

COMMON SENSE AGRICULTURAL WETLANDS ACT OF 1990

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation entitled the "Common Sense Agricultural Wetlands Act of 1990" which addresses my concerns with the Federal management of agricultural wetlands.

Mr. President, the primary thrust of my legislation is to amend a wetlands conservation program created 4 years ago which is causing confusion and frustration among Oklahoma farmers and ranchers. This program, enacted with the Food Security Act of 1985 and nicknamed the "swampbuster," denies farm program benefits to any person who converts a wetland to produce an agricultural commodity.

The impact of this program in Oklahoma is widespread and substantial. To date, agricultural wetland determinations, conducted as a result of the Wetland Conservation Program, are complete for about half the State. Over 41,000 acres have already been identified as agricultural wetlands and over 2,500 farmers and ranchers in 37 counties are receiving notices from the Soil Conservation Service saying they have agricultural wetlands on their property. Based on information supplied by the SCS, we estimate 6,000 farmers and over 100,000 acres will eventually be affected by this program in Oklahoma alone.

Mr. President, I fully agree that our Nation has an abundance of valuable wetland resources which need to be protected for future generations, but it is time to fine-tune the legal definition of wetlands by applying some common sense. As things now stand, farmers and ranchers could lose all their Federal farm benefits if they plant on a parcel of land—no matter how small, no matter how long it's been farmed—that meets the legal definition of a wetland.

That just does not make sense.

The Common Sense Agricultural Wetlands Act was drafted in a manner which I believe addresses the concerns of farmers and ranchers, while maintaining the underlying interest of the Federal Government to protect valuable wetland habitat. The Common Sense Act will not result in the wholesale destruction of valuable wetland habitat. Persons who drain, fill, or otherwise modify significant wetland areas which have not traditionally been farmed will still risk the loss of all Federal Farm Program benefits.

Mr. President, the Common Sense Agricultural Wetlands Act of 1990 consists of three basic sections dealing with the Wetlands Conservation Programs, Clean Water Act section 404 permits, and Farmers Home Administration land inventory procedures, respectively. Rather than describing each of these sections, I respectively request that a summary of the legislation be included in the RECORD.

In recent weeks several bills affecting wetland programs have been introduced in the Senate. While the Common Sense Act and other wetlands legislation share some provisions, the Common Sense Act is the only bill which establishes a de minimis size and value determination and a cost/benefit analysis. Additionally, my legislation is the first legislative attempt to prevent the Farmers Home Administration from arbitrarily placing conservation easements on land as it passes through Federal inventory.

I am also pleased to say the Oklahoma Farm Bureau, the Oklahoma Farmers Union, the Oklahoma Wheat Growers Association, the Oklahoma Cattlemen's Association, and the Oklahoma Peanut Growers Association all support the Common Sense Agricultural Wetlands Act.

Mr. President, knowing that the Senate Agriculture Committee will likely devote considerable time to wetlands issues in the 1990 farm bill debate, I am hopeful that my colleagues will give my legislation due consideration as they examine these issues.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill and a summary of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Not later than 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall promulgate regulations necessary to carry out the amendments made by this Act.

THE COMMON SENSE AGRICULTURAL WETLANDS ACT OF 1990

WETLAND CONSERVATION AMENDMENTS

Current law

Any person who produces an agricultural commodity on a converted wetland loses ALL farm program benefits, including: deficiency payments, crop insurance, disaster payments, and FmHA loans.

The Common Sense Agricultural Wetlands Act of 1990

Authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to reduce wetland conservation program penalties in relation to the severity of the producer's infraction.

Requires the Secretary to develop a "de minimis" standard for agricultural wetlands which considers: the relative size of the wetland; and the conservation, wildlife, and recreation value of the wetland.

Exempts agricultural wetlands which don't exceed the "de minimis" standard established by the Secretary. Wetlands may also be exempted based on a cost-benefit analysis conducted by the local conservationist that compares: the value of long term loss of agricultural production on the land, the cost to restore or maintain the area as a wetland, and the cost to the federal government to administer the area and ensure compliance; with the conservation, wildlife, and recreational value of such land.

Exempts land traditionally devoted to the production of an agricultural commodity. Land shall be considered traditionally devoted to the production of an agricultural commodity if an agricultural commodity was produced, or considered to be planted, for any 6 years in the ten year period preceding the enactment of this legislation.

Requires the Secretary to allow persons notified of wetland determinations prior to the passage of these amendments to request a revised ruling from SCS under the new provisions.

Requires the Secretary to submit an annual report to the Congress on the progress of implementing wetland conservation programs.

AMENDMENT TO THE FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT

Current law

Section 404 of the Clean Water Act prohibits the discharge of dredged or fill material into wetlands under the jurisdiction of the Corps of Engineers and the EPA. The law provides an agriculture exemption, but it is too vague to be effective and its administration has been inconsistent.

The Common Sense Agricultural Wetlands Act of 1990

Exempts from the jurisdiction of the Corps and the EPA any wetland that is traditionally devoted to agricultural production. Land shall be considered to be traditionally devoted to agricultural production if such land was devoted to agriculture production for any six years in the ten-year period preceding the enactment of this legislation.

DISPOSITION OF INVENTORY LAND

Current law

FmHA has the authority to place conservation easements on inventory land even if it is simply passing through federal inventory. FmHA also has the authority to transfer portions of inventory lands to federal, state, and local agencies, or private nonprofit entities for conservation purposes.

The Common Sense Agricultural Wetlands Act of 1990

Requires the FmHA to make every effort to publicly sell inventory lands as is, without the encumbrance of conservation easements. FmHA would also be required to make every effort to publicly sell inventory lands before transferring them to third parties.

REGULATIONS

Current law

The federal definition of a wetland and most of the procedures used to implement federal wetland programs have never been submitted to public review and comment.

The Common Sense Agricultural Wetlands Act of 1990

Requires the Secretary to develop regulations and procedures to carry out the amendments made by this legislation no later than 180 days after its enactment. These regulations and procedures would be subject to public review and comment.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

RECOGNITION OF HARRY VINES

● Mr. BUMPERS. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate Harry Vines, coach of the Rollin' Razorbacks wheelchair basketball team, on receiving a 1990 President's Volunteer Action Award.

Coach Vines will receive this special recognition for his commitment and dedication to the wheelchair basketball program.

The Rollin' Razorbacks started as a recreation team 12 years ago, and since joining the National Wheelchair Basketball Association in 1980, they have reached the final four twice. This past year, the Rollin' Razorbacks ended their season with a 28–2 record and were runners-up in the National Wheelchair Basketball Tournament.

In addition to coaching the Rollin' Razorbacks, Harry Vines coached the United States wheelchair basketball team in the 1987 Stoke-Mandeville Games in Great Britain and led the United States team on a goodwill tour of The Netherlands last year. He has also been selected to coach the United States team for the Gold Cup competition in Belgium this summer. We in Arkansas are very proud of Coach Vines and we are equally proud of the Rollin' Razorbacks.

This has been a good year for Coach Vines and the Rollin' Razorbacks, and I wish them all the best in the seasons ahead.●

PULITZER FOR WILSON

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, just 3 short years ago, I stood on the Senate floor and beamed with pride that a Minnesotan, August Wilson, had just won a Pulitzer Prize for drama, for his work, "Fences."

On April 12, 1990, August Wilson again received that distinguished honor, this time for his play "The Piano Lesson." In spite of these honors, though, Wilson remains a humble, down-to-earth man.

Wilson's recognition now puts him in a category with some of America's literary giants, namely Eugene O'Neill and Robert E. Sherwood, who together garnered seven Pulitzer Prize for drama.

In his critically acclaimed works, Wilson is treading out new paths in America, and human drama. Black and white audiences alike are learning, through Wilson, that the tragedies and triumphs of life know no color, income, or territory. And, he teaches us this lesson in humanity by making us use our imaginations, as well as our hearts, to further understand the special characters of his story.

The people of St. Paul are particularly proud of Wilson, who chose the city as his home in 1978. Today, I want to share that pride with my colleagues in the Senate, by submitting for the RECORD, the front page story from the St. Paul Pioneer Press, April 13, 1990, which gives us all a little insight into this very rare master.

It reads as follows:

"PIANO LESSON" SCORES PULITZER FOR PLAYWRIGHT WILSON

(By Diane Hellekson and Roy M. Close)

NEW YORK.—St. Paul playwright August Wilson won the 1990 Pulitzer Prize for drama, his second Pulitzer, for his 1987 play "The Piano Lesson."

Wilson, 44, won his first Pulitzer for "Fences" in 1987. "The Piano Lesson," which premiered at the Yale Repertory Theater in 1987 and was a finalist for last year's Pulitzer, will open Monday on Broadway.

In New York to attend previews of the play this week, Wilson was giving an interview in the Edison Hotel coffeeshop when he heard news of the award.

"I'm glad for this particular play, and for the cast, which has stuck with the play for two years," he said.

Pulitzer Prizes are awarded annually by Columbia University for outstanding achievement in journalism and the arts.

Finalists for this year's drama award were Maria Irene Fornes for "And What of the Night?" and A.R. Gurney for "Love Letters."

Only two other playwrights have received more Pulitzer Prizes than Wilson: Eugene O'Neill, who won four from 1920 to 1957, and Robert E. Sherwood, who won three between 1936 and 1941.

Set in 1936, "The Piano Lesson" tells the story of Boy Willie, who travels to his sister Berniece's home in Pittsburgh, where he hopes to raise money to buy a cotton farm. The land had been owned by a character named Sutter, a descendant of the man who owned Willie's ancestors as slaves. But in order to buy Sutter's farm, Willie must sell a family heirloom, a valuable piano carved with the faces and events from his family's past.

To complicate matters, Sutter's ghost is living in Berniece's house. Because of this and Willie's opportunity to buy the farm, she believes her brother was responsible for the white man's death.

"I've always liked the play," Wilson said. "I think it at least poses some more important questions than, say, 'Fences' did: What do you do with your legacy? Do you acquire a sense of self-worth by denying your past?"

With its strong characterization and vivid dialogue, "The Piano Lesson" is typical of Wilson, who has been praised for his accessible portrayals of 20th century black Americans. Incorporating gentle humor as well as tragedy, the plays are also notable for their use of black speech patterns.

"The good playwrights don't speak like anybody else," said Lloyd Richards, artistic director of Yale Repertory Theatre, New Haven, Conn. "He has a marvelous faculty for storytelling, which transfers itself to his characters."

Yale Repertory has premiered all. Wilson's plays since 1984, most recently "Two Trains Running," which opened March 30. Richards also is directing "The Piano Lesson" on Broadway.

Wilson, a high school dropout with three honorary degrees, was born in Pittsburgh in 1945. He grew up in the poor, predominantly black Hill district with his mother and five siblings, and dropped out of school at age 15 after a teacher wrongly accused him of plagiarism. He honed his literary skills as a poet, and wrote his first play in the 1960s.

Wilson moved to St. Paul in 1978, after developing a fondness for the city during a visit to work on a play here with Claude Purdy, resident director of Penumbra Theater. Penumbra has staged two of Wilson's plays, "Ma Rainey's Black Bottom" and "Jitney," and will present "Fences" in May.

Wilson, who lives with his wife, Judy Oliver, in the Cathedral Hill neighborhood, is a habitue of such local establishments as Tommy K's and Cognac McCarthy's—bars that serve as informal "offices" for the playwright.

Wilson wrote portions of several plays over coffee and cigarettes at Esteban's, formerly on Grand Avenue.

Characteristically humble, Wilson says the second Pulitzer won't change his life. "I'm going to continue doing the same thing I've been doing, which is writing plays." He is currently revising "Two Trains Running" and working on a new play, "Moon Going Down."

Will he continue to work in St. Paul's saloons? "Oh sure," he said. "That's the only way I know how to do it."●

COMDR. ANTHONY WATSON HONORED

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, Rev. Elmer Fowler, who is a religious and civic leader in Chicago and has stood up on so many positive, constructive things for that city, will be presenting to Comdr. Tony Watson, an award known as the Heritage and Freedom Award on May 20. It has been given to a distinguished group of Americans, including the first one to Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, whose leadership on the national level we all recognize.

Mayor Harold Washington was one of the recipients.

For this man, who came from the Cabrini Green housing projects in Chicago and has achieved the rank of commander at Annapolis, it is a great tribute. It is also a great tribute to his family and all those who helped him along the way.

The ceremony in Chicago will begin at 11 a.m., and then there will be a luncheon honoring him.

I ask that three articles about Tony Watson and this award be printed in the RECORD at this point. The first one is a "Professional Profile" which appeared in the publication U.S. Black Engineers; the second is titled "From Mess Attendant to Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff," written by Reverend Fowler; and the third is an article written by William Mullen, which appeared in the Chicago Tribune magazine on July 2, 1989. I commend Reverend Fowler and all who have played a role in this tribute.

PROFESSIONAL PROFILE: COMDR. TONY WATSON

Watson started at the Naval Academy in aerospace engineering: "I got attracted to submarines after visiting one during my junior year. I thought I'd like it, and it turned out to be the right decision."

One's first impression of Commander Tony Watson is his size. He is likely the largest man aboard the USS Hammerhead, in height and bulk. An ex-football player and boxer, Watson has the fit look of a man who's stayed in shape since his athletic days. He also has the overall appearance of great strength. As the Executive Officer of the ship, his duties include running its many systems, including the nuclear power plant, and making sure the officers and enlisted men keep the ship running smoothly. And to do all that, strength is just what he needs.

As XO, Cmdr. Watson is second in command of the USS Hammerhead. He executes the policies of the ship and the commanding officer. An XO is also there, he says, "to relieve in case the commanding officer of the ship becomes incapacitated for some reason." For the most part, though, his job is "to carry out the day-to-day routine of the ship, to make the ship ready to go to sea from the standpoint of tactical training, making sure we're ready to do the job we're assigned to do in terms of combat readiness, as well as other objectives, such as projecting the flag overseas, pulling into ports and showing those other countries we're there to support them."

A soft-spoken man for the most part, Watson can definitely use his powerful voice when necessary. However, during the several hours it took to conduct this interview, his quiet, courteous manner predominated with visitor and crew alike. The Hammerhead was in Norfolk, Virginia, for refitting and repairs, and the men aboard seemed to know exactly what Watson expected of them. It is this quiet discipline that most distinguishes Tony Watson from civilians at his level of accomplishment. Yet listening to him speak of his achievements means hearing about his pride at the accomplishments of the men under his command.

As he puts it, his main job is to "organize everybody else to get done what they need to do so I can get done what I need to do." Often that job requires more than just the strength he obviously has. "There are so many objectives to be met on a ship—training, getting people off on leave, maintaining the ship in a top material readiness condition—that you can't get it all done all the time as designed, as you planned to do it."

Tony Watson grew up in the Cabrini Green section of Chicago. A tough part of the city, Watson admits "I don't even like to walk the streets at night, now." "Ramsey Lewis, Curtis Mayfield and Mr. T. are other well-known Americans who also spent their youths there. Watson attended Lane Tech in Chicago, and then went on to the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Maryland, to study aerospace engineering. "I had always wanted to be a jet pilot," he recalls. "Always until I flew in a Navy jet. The guy took me up to about 40,000 feet and turned us over and took us down to about 20,000 feet and I decided that really wasn't what I wanted to do for the next 20 years. From that point I got attracted to submarines after visiting one during my junior year. I thought I'd like it, and it turned out to be the right decision."

After serving for 12 years aboard five different ships in the nuclear submarine force, Watson was assigned shore duty in New London, Connecticut. This "easier" work led him to make a decision which changed his life as much as that ride in a Navy jet had earlier. He left the service, but not for long.

"I got out and worked for Potomac Electric Power Company in Washington, D.C., as Operations Coordinator. My job was to improve the operational efficiency of all the power plants in the PEPCO system around Washington. It was a really interesting job to me because I like the area around Washington. All the plants are within a one hour drive, and I got to do a lot of things in the area. It worked out real well for me except that the job is not a fraction of the challenge that this job is. And that's what my decision to come back boiled down to. Fortunately, I'd stayed active in the Reserves, and I opted to come back in October, 1983."

He served three months aboard a Los Angeles Class submarine, the U.S.S. Birmingham, "to requalify as a nuclear engineer." And then Commander Watson came to the Hammerhead as Executive Officer. He missed some advancement possibilities while he was out of the Navy. At 36, he admits he is "running a little bit behind the curve because I was out for one year. I'm a bit senior to be here as XO. I have classmates who are commanding submarines. So, this will be a relatively short tour before I go on to command."

Unlike naval surface ship assignments, nuclear submarine force officers have only two choices of duty. While surface ship officers can choose from several ship types, aircraft carriers, cruisers, destroyers, and so on, "We have only two types of at-sea assignments," Watson explained. "Either an SSN fast attack submarine like this one, or an FBM ballistic missile submarine, in which the engineering complex is virtually the same." However, there are many more nuclear-powered submarines than are surface ships, so officers tend to get higher responsibility sooner in the submarine service. That's not to say that surface ship nuclear engineering officers don't have "relatively the same amount of responsibility in terms of men that they handle and the amount of material and equipment they're responsible for" up through the lieutenant commander level, according to Watson.

Rather, "In the senior commander and captain ranks in the surface force you get assigned to different kinds of jobs. A commander in the surface nuclear fleet would likely get assigned to be engineer of a power plant as opposed to being commanding officer of the ship. And he could be assigned to be Reactor Officer on a larger ship class, such as a cruiser or an aircraft carrier where he may be responsible for reactor complexes that are 5 times as big as the engineering complex we have."

Learning nuclear reactor procedure in the Navy is proably the finest training in the world. While we hear about accidents and mishaps in civilian power plants, we never do about naval reactors. Cmdr. Watson attributes this difference to one person. "I think the difference is clear. I've worked on both sides now. The difference is the program that Admiral (Hyman) Rickover built. From day one, the difference between ours and the others are the standards we exact, that we demand, that we comply with. We do things by procedure. One of the fundamental areas of our training program is that we conduct formal training sessions to make sure that all of our operators understand the principles involved in the operation of the propulsion plant. So that when they go to turn a switch or open a valve they know what to expect to happen. And if it doesn't happen, then they undo what they did. And with as many valves and pipes as we have jammed into a submarine, the guys who operate those systems have to know what they're doing. There are hundreds, thousands of valves."

"We train to such detail," he continued, "that when those guys crack a valve open there's a certain procedure they use. They crack the valve, listen for the sound, confirm for themselves that the sound they're hearing is the sound of fluid passing, or the sound of just a little fluid passing until it pressurizes the area to the next valve and then the sound should stop. We train them, we hammer it into them until it's natural. And we spend the time to do that. A good portion of each day, probably an hour a day, we use to train people. And they don't do that, they can't afford to do that, the public won't pay for that much training to be done in the private sector right now. That tide is changing, I think, as a result of TMI (Three Mile Island). It's going to have to. If we expect people to react properly, we're going to have to train them how to react. And we do that, and that's the difference."

Fast attack submarines operate against other ships rather than land targets. They might provide support for aircraft carrier forces, or operate independently, quietly perusing objectives in any part of the oceans. The Hammerhead's home port is Norfolk, where Watson and the crew spend approximately half the year. Of course, being at sea for extended periods, away from family and friends, has drawbacks as well. For Watson, though, who has worked recently in both the civilian sector and the Navy, the drawbacks are more than compensated for by the rewards and gratifications of his job.

"The greatest gratification comes from having done a job that is unique in the world. There are only a hundred and some odd U.S. submarines. They have a unique job to do. And it's tough getting from point A to point B. And it makes me feel proud when I stand up in front of these 136 guys in our ship's crew and know that each one of those guys is an expert in his particular area. And that they can take what looks like this simple black tube sitting in the water and make it do all kinds of things out there in the middle of the ocean, without making any noise, without letting anybody know we're there, and to get the job done. The submarine leaves port and it hardly ever communicates with anybody. We go out and get the job done and come back into port and nobody ever knows we've even left except our families. There's a lot of satisfaction in that. It also gives me a lot of satisfaction to be serving on a ship that has virtually the best retention program in the Navy. We've been on the retention honor roll for the past 47 months. That says a lot about the way we conduct business, because the ships that remain on the honor roll are those ships where people are satisfied."

All Naval Academy graduates are engineers of one sort or another. Tony Watson hoped to fly, so he started in aerospace engineering there. Now, he has switched over to nuclear engineering in order to understand and run the propulsion plant aboard his submarine. Aside from getting a sound education in the basics of science and math underlying engineering fields, what he calls "understanding how forces work," the most important advice Watson has for young engineers is "to get a reasonable balance of art courses under their belts, things such as writing, political science and others. I took one political science course in my four years at the Naval Academy, in my last semester. I enjoyed the dickens out of it. And it was unfortunately too late at that point to go back and do more. After I graduated, I got interested in subjects like philosophy and reading about the history of the world. And I really had no outlet for it at that time. I was working this job and didn't have time to go to school and take those courses, and it was too late. I really wish I had done it in school. Those who are already committed to going into an engineering field are going to get as much and more engineering as they want to get. They will not be lacking for that, and if they are, there will always be guidance from others. But that's not the case if you want to do other things in your life." Not being aware then how much enjoyment he would get from such subjects later in life, Watson admits, "If I could go back and redo my college days, that's one thing I'd do differently."

The future holds a great deal of promise for Comdr. Tony Watson. His next move is "Commanding Officer, hopefully of a Los Angeles class submarine here in Norfolk. That's what I'll be lobbying for, maybe in another year or so. That's always the lobbying effort because everybody wants a brand new submarine out of Norfolk. There's probably five ships available for fifty people, so it's tough and competitive."

Tony Watson wouldn't have it any other way. "I got out of the Navy to get into what I thought was greener pasture in the civilian world. And I found the biggest difference to be that this point in my life I still need more adventure. As Maslow and Hertzberg, the new management theorists, would say, the money is never the real issue with respect to job satisfaction. The real motivators are job satisfiers, doing well and being told that you're doing well, doing something that you can see makes a difference in the world. And everybody in this crew, I think, feels some of that satisfaction."

From Mess Attendant to Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff

Prior to 1941, American citizens of the black race could only serve in the United States Navy as mess attendants. During the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor, Dorie Miller was serving on board the U.S.S. Arizona as mess attendant. The captain of the ship was mortally wounded and the gunners were killed. Dorie Miller moved the captain to a safer place on the ship and took over an idle machine gun and shot down several Japanese planes without difficulty. Through the efforts of the Pittsburgh Courier and the Chicago Defender, both Negro newspapers, this issue was raised through the press, and after much public discussion President Roosevelt awarded Dorie Miller the Navy Cross. It was presented to him by Admiral Chester Nimetz.

In 1943, the navy department selected fifteen (15) black sailors and put them in a training program at the Great Lakes Naval Training Center to become lieutenants. Upon completion of their training, they were not allowed to graduate. Because of the intense struggle of these fifteen sailors they were named "golden 15", and became the first black officers in the U.S. Navy. Thus began the long road toward integrating the negro into the U.S. Navy.

The Dorie Miller Foundation was organized in Chicago by the Reverend Elmer L. Fowler. The Dorie Miller Award was dedicated to be presented to individuals and organizations who would make noble contributions for the progress, welfare and prestige of American citizens of the black race. Annually, the Dorie Miller Foundation would host the Dorie Miller Commemoration Program; presenting the award to outstanding individuals or organizations. Jackie Robinson was the first black American to enter organized baseball, and the first to receive the Dorie Miller Award.

Since that time, the list of outstanding citizens has increased greatly in the last forty-seven (47) years. The members of the United States Senate who have received the American Heritage & Freedom Award are: the Honorable Charles H. Percy, the Honorable Ernest Hollings, the late Honorable Paul H. Douglas, and the late Honorable Everett M. Dirksen. The members of the U.S. House of Representatives include: the Honorable Margaret Stitt-Church, the Honorable Cardiss Collins, the Honorable Charles A. Hayes, the late Honorable Ralph H. Metcalf and the late Honorable Barrett O'Hare. The last person to receive this award in 1989, before his death, was the late Honorable Claude Pepper.

On March 3, 1989 Senator Byrd gave a resounding tribute on the floor of Congress honoring Senator Pepper for his long tenure both as senator and congressman. Later that same day in his office, Senator Pepper received the American Heritage & Freedom Award presented to him by Rev. Fowler.

In 1979, fifteen (15) outstanding black women of our nation received the American Heritage & Freedom Award. Among the outstanding American women chosen to receive this award were Congresswoman Cardiss Collins, the then newly elected chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus. The fourteen (14) other distinguished women chosen to receive the award were: Dr. Geraldine P. Woods, Chairman of the Board, Howard University; Attorney Margaret Bush Wilson, Chairman of the Board of the National NAACP; Dr. Dorothy I. Height, President of the National Council of Women; Dr. Dorothy L. Brown, the first black woman surgeon in the South; Mrs. Coretta Scott King, wife of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Center for Social Change; Mrs. C. Throughout the history of the United States of America, black women have led the country in stamina, strength and dedication. This country can never forget the Harriett Tubmans, the Sojourner Truths, the Barbara Jordans; the contributions of black women in general, who have formed a strong coalition to push black Americans to excellence.

In Chicago, on Sunday, May 20, 1990, Captain Anthony Watson will be honored with the 47th Annual American Heritage and Freedom Award.

Tony Watson was born and raised in the Cabrini-Green housing project. He distinguished himself by graduating from Lane Tech High School—an "A" student. He graduated from the Naval Academy and served in the United States Navy as Executive Officer of the U.S.S. Hammer Head. Recently he served as Captain of the U.S.S. Jacksonville, one of America's finest atomic propelled submarines.

On November 10, 1989, Commander Watson was relieved of his duties on board the Jacksonville, and received his stripes as captain in the United States Navy. He is now deputy Commander of the United States Naval Academy.

The accomplishments of this one man, Captain Anthony Watson, makes him an outstanding Role Model for the young people of America today. He certainly deserves the high honor that we will bestow upon him in Chicago.

Tributes will be made by the U.S. Navy Department, the Governor of the State of Illinois, James Thompson, the Mayor of the city of Chicago, Richard M. Daley, and many other outstanding citizens of Chicago and the State of Illinois.

The theme for this year's ceremony will be from Dorie Miller at Pearl Harbor to Anthony Watson at the Naval Academy, and from Mess attendant to the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

Though black Americans have come a long way in the Navy, we realize they have a long way to go to accomplish full integration and to enjoy the privileges of all other American citizens in the armed forces.

As we look back from here to 1943, when 15 black sailors were sent to Great Lakes for training to become lieutenants, it is rewarding to see 10 black admirals, many lieutenants, and lieutenant commanders, including Dr. Ronald A. McNair who lost his life on board the space shuttle. Captain Watson is the ideal person to represent black Americans, who have served America in all national and international conflicts. Their sweat, blood and tears have made this country strong and free.

All of America salutes him.

BACK HOME: ONE OF AMERICA'S BEST AND BRIGHTEST WARRIORS RETURNS TO CHICAGO WITH A MESSAGE

(By William Mullen)

At a Monday breakfast gathering earlier this year, Anthony John "Tony" Watson stands in front of a group of pin-striped executives at the ever-so-proper Union League Club. At 6 feet 1, the trim but muscular former athlete, resplendent in the dress-blue uniform of a U.S. Navy commander, fits right in.

Watson's mission is to deliver a lecture and slide show on the relative strengths of American and Soviet naval power, which he does with professional polish and aplomb. But he also uses part of his time at the Union League, a posh, tasteful preserve for the rich and powerful, to make an appeal to the gathered executives. Watson asks them to get involved with programs designed to lift the spirits and horizons of children growing up a few miles north in the Cabrini-Green housing project. Chicago's grim and perhaps most notorious preserve of poverty, crime and social aberration. Watson grew up there from his infancy.

The day before, Watson spoke to quite a different audience, the congregation at the 11 a.m. service of the Third Baptist Church at 1551 W. 95th St. The church, a cavernous former movie palace done in Art Deco style, is headed by its popular pastor, the Rev. Elmer L. Fowler, recently elected president of the South Side Chapter of the Chicago NAACP.

The congregation was honoring the memory of two old friends of the church—Adm. Draper Kauffman and his wife, Peggy, both deceased. The service was part of the dedication ceremonies for the Peggy Kauffman Friendship House, a newly opened shelter for homeless elderly people a few blocks away from the church. Among the guests were members and friends of the Kauffman family, including Mrs. Prescott Bush, the late admiral's sister and President Bush's sister-in-law. Watson, who had been befriended by the Kauffmans at a critical time in his life, was the guest speaker.

As at home in that church as at the Union League Club, Watson sits in the congregation with his mother, Mrs. Virginia Watson, 64, and his grandmother, Mrs. Ethel Smith, 84, and two younger sisters. He's completely attuned to the gospel music of the church's enormous choir, which performs with such soaring, foot-stomping emotion that three women faint away.

When it comes time for him to speak, Watson again carries out his mission with aplomb. After giving a heartfelt tribute to the Kauffmans, he singles out children in the congregation and, using himself as an example, gives them a stirring lecture on how anyone can rise above his or her disadvantaged background and beat the odds to become anything he or she desires to be. He then delivers a moving memorial to the positive influence he received from his father, and by the time he speaks directly to his mother on behalf of himself and his two brothers and three sisters, there's hardly a dry eye left in the church: "You engineered us out of the projects. You didn't have any equations. You didn't have any tools. But, Mom, you are the reason we're here."

Watson is used to being called upon as a role model and often uses his meager free time to speak to black children directly or to others on their behalf. A 1970 graduate of the U.S. Naval Academy, he is a man of many accomplishments. Late this year he will have captain's stripes sewn onto his uniform when he returns to the academy as deputy commandant. Until then, he will continue as commander of the U.S.S. Jacksonville, a nuclear attack submarine.

The Jacksonville is a billion-dollar piece of technology with supersecret electronic and weapons systems that approach the complexity of the systems in the space shuttle. Its mission is to seek out and monitor Soviet submarines in the vast, underwater expanse of the Atlantic Ocean and, should war break out, to help destroy them. Commanding a ship with such a doomsday mission requires the combined skills of an ace engineer, a superb leader of men and a cunning hunter/killer. Watson's job, in short, is reserved for only a few of the brightest and most capable naval officers, men who rise to the top after years of rigorous training and intense competition.

One child accomplishing as much as Tony Watson has would make any family proud, but the children of Johnny and Virginia

Watson are all sources of family pride. In order of age, Charles, 42, is a Chicago accountant. George, 41, is a public-affairs representative with the Chicago Sun-Times. Tony, 40, having made the list for promotion to captain well ahead of most of his Annapolis classmates, could well become an admiral just a few years from now. Barbara, 36, is a supervisor at the Federal Reserve Bank in Chicago. Diane, 30, is an account supervisor at a credit union on Vandenberg Air Force Base in California. Liz, 26, is an electrical engineer and area manager for Illinois Bell Telephone Co.

It's the sort of story Americans like—all six children of a humble working-class family rising and planting themselves firmly in the middle class. All six grew up in Cabrini-Green. Their father, who died at the age of 64 in 1983, was a working man most of his life. He was an ink mixer for various Chicago printing companies until he was fired from his last job in the middle 1960s, the vicissitudes of alcoholism having caught up with him.

When their father stopped working, their mother became a teacher's aide at Jenner Elementary School inside Cabrini-Green, where all the six children had begun their education. Virginia Watson still works at the school, and she still lives in Cabrini-Green. There was never much money in the Watson household then, barely enough to keep food on the table and keep the kids in clothing. Yet all six of them went on to college and are now successful professionals, married and comfortably raising families of their own.

One factor in their success may well be that the family moved into the housing project before it became Cabrini-Green. Johnny and Virginia Watson, both raised on the West Side and both high school graduates, married in 1946. After their third child, Tony, was born in 1949, they began looking for something larger than the small apartment in Johnny's mother's house where they had been living.

Virginia's mother, who worked at Montgomery Ward's mail-order headquarters on Chicago Avenue, had noticed the lovely little Chicago Housing Authority rowhouse project near the Ward's warehouse. Named for Mother Frances Cabrini, the first American elevated to sainthood by the Catholic Church, the 583-unit project had been opened in 1943. Johnny and Virginia looked it over, liked what they saw, applied for a two-bedroom rowhouse and, their application accepted, moved in.

It was 1950, several years before the towering high-rises that now characterize Cabrini-Green were built. The rowhouses were then racially integrated, and the neighborhood surrounding them was a run-down but bustling Italian community known as "Little Sicily."

"The first place we lived in at Cabrini had houses across the street with mostly Italians living in them," says George Watson. "We had stores, laundries and delicatessens all over the neighborhood. We grew up in the midst of St. Philip Benizi parish. I have very good memories of that. The parish had a three-day feast every year, and everybody got in on it, including those of us from the rowhouses.

"It wasn't until after the high-rises were built that old ladies from the parish got beat up and rolled. After that started to happen, the church decided not to hold the feast anymore. The Italians began to move out of the neighborhood, and very few of them even came back to attend church there. That's when things began to change at Cabrini-Green."

Virginia Watson also had fond memories of Cabrini before much of the old neighborhood fell to the wrecker's ball to make way for the first high-rises in 1958. In those days, she says, the CHA ran the project much more strictly than it does now. She says there were frequent visits from housing officials to make sure tenants were properly maintaining their units. The CHA also used to keep stricter standards for screening potential tenants.

"In those days you had to show marriage certificates to get into an apartment," Mrs. Watson says. "There were no single parents in here then, and if a tenant was in trouble with the law, they couldn't stay here. You had more of a family atmosphere in those days, and parents paid more attention to their kids.

"In 1962, after the William Green high-rises went up, somebody from the CHA office asked us if we would be interested in moving into them, knowing we had a large family in a two-bedroom rowhouse. They showed us a brand-new four-bedroom unit, with all new cabinets, kitchen and everything. Johnny and I weighed that with having a front yard and a back yard in the townhouse. We thought it would be too hard to watch all those kids from a high-rise apartment, and we decided to stay in the rowhouses even if it was pretty cramped."

Instead they moved into a larger, three-bedroom rowhouse, the one in which Mrs. Watson still resides. The Watson's decision to stay in the rowhouses seems to have been a crucially positive one in the upbringing of their children.

Most of the whites in the neighborhood had left by the time the last high-rises were built in 1962, and street gangs started to fight for dominance at Cabrini-Green. The rivalries eventually evolved into an ongoing battle between two large South Side gangs, the Black P Stone Nation and the Disciples. Tony Watson recalls how he and his brothers used to try to find various "safe routes" out of the projects to go to the store or to downtown moviehouses. Often they failed, he says, and got beaten up and robbed.

But the rowhouses themselves remained something of an oasis in the nasty high-rise environment that had engulfed them. The families in the rowhouses tended to be long-term tenants, families headed by both parents. The men made their presence known on the sidewalks in front of the rowhouses, and the gang members pretty much stayed away. No father was more vigilant than Johnny Watson.

William Nash, 40, an Ohio telephone-company executive, is a Cabrini-Green "alumnus" who boosted himself out of the project with a master's degree in business administration. He and Watson were best friends until they went to different high schools. He remembers Watson's father as a stern parent who policed the behavior of all the neighborhood children.

"You have to keep in mind that we were in grammar school during the transition (of Cabrini-Green) from a mixed to an all-black neighborhood," Nash says. "There was a group of us, 8 or 10 kids, who were about all that was going on academically even then in the school, and Tony was one of them. His dad always made him study.

"If a bunch of us were out fooling around in the evening and we decided to stay out later than usual, Tony always had to go home. The gangs were starting to come in, and crime was becoming more and more of a problem, but Tony's dad did a great job insulating his kids from what was going on."

"Daddy set standards for me—for all the kids," Tony Watson himself says. "He kept after us to clean the house, to be home when we were supposed to be there, to study when we were supposed to study. He wasn't so concerned about how well we did in our studies as much as how well we could apply ourselves. He was strict, but he was generous with his pride and his praise when we did well."

The youngest daughter, Liz, born in 1963, never knew Cabrini-Green as anything other than what it is today, a high-rise jungle, though she maintains she never thought of it as a particularly dangerous place to live.

"I know this sounds silly," Liz says, "but Daddy kept such strict control over us that I got all the way through high school before I realized gangs were a real problem in the project. He just never let us go even near the high-rises. We had to ask permission to just go a block down the street to buy an ice-cream cone."

"Johnny kept the kids on a pretty short leash," Mrs. Watson says. "We didn't demand that they do well in school, but we demanded that they be in the house at night, studying. Even in the summer, if there was no school, Johnny wouldn't let the kids play on the sidewalk in front of the house with the other neighborhood kids unless either he or I was out there watching. It wasn't just life in the projects. Both Johnny and I were raised that way."

But along with their strict vigilance, the Watsons also filled their children's lives with as much intellectual stimulation and cultural enrichment as they could provide. The memories each of the six children have of their home life glow with stories of parental love and support.

While his father was the disciplinarian, Tony Watson says it was his mother who, by example, pushed her children to do well in school. "Mom was always reading something, and every day she was doing crossword puzzles and doing other things to improve her mind," he says. "She was always making us practice speaking and penmanship, and she was always there to help us with our homework. If she didn't know an answer to one of our questions, she was in the library the next day to find it. I think of that every day, even now."

Barbara, the oldest of the daughters, remembers her mother as always looking for cultural-enrichment programs, scholarships and study grants for her children. She was always willing to get on a bus and spend a day scouting schools and colleges that offered such programs.

"Growing up, I had the same experiences as little white girls did," says Barbara. "I took dancing lessons and went to summer camp every year. One thing Mama and Daddy always made sure of: They always had time for each of us individually. It seems old-fashioned now, but dinner time was always family time. The television was always off, and we talked."

Whatever Johnny and Virginia Watson did to nurture their kids, they did it well. Blessed with bright minds, all six of them did well in school. Both Tony and Liz skipped two grades in grammar school and entered Lane Tech High School at age 12. For Tony, it was first foray into a larger world where he was expected to compete with an overwhelming majority of whites. Very few blacks were going to Lane Tech in the early '60s, and racial tension was not terribly high, but somebody spat on Tony as he walked into Lane on his first day of school.

He was then only 12, but Tony had the maturity to rise above the affront. Ignoring his attacker, he calmly walked into the building, washed and settled in. In the ensuing days and years, he applied himself to his classes and went out for football, eventually becoming a star varsity offensive end. Academically, he graduated with a B average in the school's elite honors program, which was then limited to 40 students.

Norman Bannor, his freshman/sophomore football coach, became a father figure and sort of mentor, a man Watson often cites as another positive influence in his life.

"There weren't many blacks at Lane when he was with us," says Bannor, "but he was the kind of kid who could fit in with anybody. He was young, but he was big enough to hold his own, and he always had a lot of desire. He had a good pair of hands and was smart, so he did very, very well in our football program. He was tough when he had to be, and he took his licks, breaking his collarbone on the last play of the season when he was a sophomore, but he was very teachable and serious. Everybody liked him. I retired in 1985 after 37 years of teaching. You begin to realize that the thing—the bonus—a teacher works for is to have a student go on to succeed in life and come back and tell you that you did something for him that helped him to succeed. Tony means a lot to me."

Impressed by his high school record, youth workers in the Lower North Youth Center at Cabrini-Green chose him as a candidate for admittance to the U.S. Naval Academy. Watson's name came up third from the top in Rep. Sidney Yates' list of Annapolis candidates in 1966. The first one on the list failed his physical examination. The second candidate did not get a high enough score on his SAT test. Watson did well in both tests and won the appointment.

Watson was more than a little afraid when he started out at Annapolis. Competing against the best at Lane Tech was one thing; competing against the best at the naval academy was another, particularly when there were only 12 blacks in the entire school of 4,800 midshipmen.

"I think people thought that being black and from a poor, inner-city housing project, I wouldn't have the sort of cultural background to succeed at Annapolis," Watson says, "I know that I worried about it. I suppose I thought most of these guys came from well-to-do families and were refined and knowledgeable about the ways of the world that I had never been exposed to."

He was assigned to a room with a white plebe from Texas who, apparently in all innocence, kept telling stories about "niggers" he knew back home. Watson is uneasy when it comes to talking about racism and glosses over such incidents as noncommittally as possible.

"I don't think he even realized that it hurt me," he says of that roommate. "But after a day of it, I decided to straighten him out, to let him know that 'nigger' was not an acceptable word in my vocabulary."

Whatever means of persuasion he used, it worked, he says, and he and his roommate became friends. The Texan, however, soon dropped out of the academy, while quiet, affable Tony Watson from Cabrini-Green stayed on and was elected president of the freshman class.

The academy's superintendent was Adm. Draper Kauffman, and early in Watson's first year, the admiral and his wife invited some of the student leaders for an informal gathering at their home. Tony, as president of his class, was one of those invited. The tall, then-gangly youth was already beside himself with nervousness at the reception when disaster struck. In an awkward moment, he spilled his cup of deep-red punch down the front of his dress-white uniform.

Mrs. Kauffman saw the accident, Tony says, and immediately came over to put him at ease. The admiral, too, came over and began to talk with him, and before the reception was over, Tony had a new mentor in his life—one, Watson would later say, who was "surely committed to racial equality."

Draper Kauffman was a rarity in the Navy of 1966. An officer who made his mark as a demolition expert and founder of the Navy's elite frogman program that was the forerunner of the Seals, he was one of the most decorated American warriors in World War II. But he was also a man ahead of his time, a man whose conscience was stricken by the Navy's overt racism. Until then, only a few from America's minority groups had ever risen above such traditionally lowly Navy slots as stewards and mess attendants.

Through his career, Kauffman had always tried to use his influence to break down racial barriers whenever and however he could. During his tenure as Annapolis superintendent, he took special care to counsel and encourage a few black midshipmen who made it there, among them Tony Watson.

"Annapolis is a very demanding place scholastically, a place where you don't get much beyond a C average unless you apply some enthusiasm," Watson says. "Adm. Kauffman was always inspiring me to work harder, to achieve something. I was really afraid I couldn't hack it there, and I worked my hind end off to keep up to flank with the other guys. I ended up getting a 3.7 (out of possible 4) grade-point average at the end of my first year."

The Navy apparently expected Watson to put his football skills to use at the academy, and he did turn up for freshman football. "I was tall enough, but I wasn't all that big then," he says. "I took one look at most of the guys out for football and realized they could just as well have been turning out for Notre Dame. They were really big guys, much bigger than (the guys) in high school, and I figured I didn't want to keep running into that kind of wall."

Instead, Watson turned his interest to the mandatory physical-education course in boxing under the academy's legendary coach, Emerson Smith. Watson wasn't particularly good at it at first, he says, but the individual nature of boxing appealed to him, and he quickly made it his sport at the academy. Oliver North and James Webb, who later became Secretary of the Navy, were Annapolis upperclassmen then and outstanding boxers who helped train Watson as he began learning the pugilistic arts.

"North was an outstanding boxer, and he taught me a considerable amount," Watson says. "Webb was smaller than me, but we once fought against each other in a match. I never though I would beat up on the future secretary of the Navy, but I did."

"I knew nothing about Tony's background when he was in his first class under me," says coach Smith. "I had a responsibility to put all midshipmen through the program, and he was just another face. He wasn't highly visible as far as ability goes. He certainly wasn't a natural. What made me notice him eventually was that he was able to work very, very hard, with great determination. That made a great difference in him. He became well-known eventually at the academy and highly respected for his boxing prowess."

In 1968 Adm. Kauffman left the academy for a new assignment. At the change-of-command ceremony, he presented his ceremonial sword, which had been worn before him by his father, also a U.S. Navy admiral, to Watson. In doing so, he told the midshipman to give it to the first officer to become Annapolis superintendent from the classes Kauffman had presided over at the academy. "I'm giving it to you," the president Kauffman told Watson, "because I believe you will be the one."

Watson's fear of failing in head-on competition with whites disappeared at Annapolis. By the time he graduated in 1970, ranking 153d scholastically in a class of 838, he had compiled an enviable record. He was a battalion boxing champion four years running and was class president in his freshman and sophomore years. He won the top leadership award in his class as a junior, when he also was made brigade commander. As a senior, he was made regimental commander, the highest military rank attainable by an Annapolis student.

Tony's success was the source of unimaginable joy and pride to the Watson rowhouse back at Cabrini-Green.

"Tony was the poorest boy at the academy, but I bet he got one thing more than any of the other midshipman," says his mother, who still glows with the memories. "He got MAIL! I was sending him letters and packages of food all week long. That first time he came home in his uniform, I can't tell you how proud we were. Yeah, those were some good days. He was succeeding. Tony would never tell us what he was doing until it was an accomplished fact, like, 'Oh, yeah, by the way, Mama, I was made class president.' "

Watson upon graduation decided to become a submariner, which meant beginning rigorous schooling in October, 1970. Ever mindful of where he came from, he convinced the Navy to let him spend the summer between his graduation and submarine school at home. He wanted to do what he could to convince kids in Cabrini-Green that they too, could compete successfully in the world outside the project.

Two days after Ens. Watson arrived home, on Friday, July 17, 1970, Sgt. James Severin and Patrolman Anthony Rizzato of the Chicago police were shot to death by snipers as they walked across Seward Park in Cabrini-Green. Over-night whatever shreds of civility had remained at the project were ripped apart. Helicopters hovered above as squads of police went from apartment to apartment in search of the killers. Dozens of innocent people were caught in the fury of emotions. Johnny Watson was arrested and thrown into jail two days later during a Sunday-morning police sweep as he walked his dog on the way to pick up the Sunday newspapers.

Although the killers, two street-gang members, soon were arrested and later convicted, it was a watershed event for Cabrini-Green, a turn for the worse that stigmatized the place as never before, a stigma that has never been erased.

For Tony Watson that summer, the gloss of his achievements didn't seem so shiny. He was a man of some acclaim at the United States Naval Academy, but back home he was just another black deemed suspicious by whites. The experience didn't embitter him, but it sobered him and perhaps hardened him to some of the realities of the Navy he was about to join as an active-duty officer.

The Navy, in 1970, was hardly a citadel of racial harmony. There were, in fact, so few black officers that the uniforms and insignias worn by Watson and other black officers might as well have been invisible. Whites, both officers and enlisted men, usually responded reflexively to Watson's color, not his rank, seldom profferring the standard salute or other gestures of protocol reserved for officers. Noting his color, they simply assumed he was an enlisted man, not an officer.

But 1970 was a watershed year for the Navy, just as it was for Cabrini-Green. Fortunately, however, it was a turn for the better, not for the worse, in the Navy.

In July of that year, Adm. Elmo Zumwalt became Chief of Naval Operations. The Navy he inherited was two decades behind the Army and the Air Force in terms of racial desegregation and equality. President Truman had issued an executive order on July 26, 1948, demanding equality of treatment and opportunity for all members of the armed services, but the Navy never really complied with it. On Dec. 17, 1970, Zumwalt issued new policy guidelines on "Equal Opportunity in the Navy" that ordered an end to discriminatory practices and set up a system of minority-affairs officers on every ship and naval installation around the world.

Watson soon found himself attending "Zumwalt Roundtables," which amounted to race-sensitivity-training sessions attended by naval personnel regardless of rank and race. Such sessions were ridiculed by many old hands, but the message began slowly to seep through the ranks.

Indeed, the message seeped through every Navy unit, including the Great Lakes Naval Training Center north of Chicago, where in 1970 Adm. Kauffman became the commanding officer, his last billet before his retirement in 1973.

Great Lakes then was a tinderbox ready to explode with racial conflict. Some of the problems arose from overt racism on the base and in the surrounding communities. The most serious came from landlords who refused to rent off-base housing to black personnel. Less serious but just as aggravating to blacks was the refusal of base commissaries to carry merchandise that catered to black lifestyles.

Kauffman met the problems head-on, ordering mess halls and base clubs to secure traditional black foods, getting commissaries to stock black cosmetics and periodicals and allowing bushy Afros for blacks along with longer hairstyles for whites and beards for everyone. Above all, he put all private housing that had refused to accept black renters in the past off-limits to all Navy personnel, whether black or white. The order caused some inconvenience to white Navy families that were forced to move to approved housing, but by giving black personnel equal access to off-base housing, it eased a great deal of the racial tension at the base.

Through it all, Kauffman worked closely with black enlisted men and officers and sought the advice of black community leaders in the area. Among them was Rev. Fowler of Chicago's Third Baptist Church, who soon became a lifelong friend of the Kauffmans.

In contrast to his early years in the service, it isn't often nowadays that Watson is mistaken for an enlisted man because he is black. Black officers now are relatively commonplace. Six percent of all naval officers are black, and the Navy is running an aggressive campaign to eventually at least match the Army officer corps, which is 10 percent black.

Charles Moskos, a Northwestern University sociologist whose special interest is the military, points out that the armed forces today are probably better integrated racially than any other segment of U.S. life. In 1985, for instance, blacks accounted for 30 percent of all Army personnel, 20 percent of the Marine Corps, 17 percent of the Air Force and 13 percent of the Navy. Since officers are executives, no other segment of American society can come close to the record of the military in granting blacks authority and responsibility over white subordinates.

The military, in fact, has become a platform for black veterans from which to enter better-paying civilian jobs. Thousands of black officers and NCOs now retire from the military each year. They carry with them skills and leadership experience eagerly sought by private companies trying, as the military did much earlier, to desegregate its middle- and upper-level management ranks.

Watson himself couldn't ignore the lure of higher pay in private industry. In 1983 he left the Navy for a high-level executive position with a private power company in Washington, D.C. It was interesting and challenging, he says, but about a year after leaving the Navy, he took some friends to a submarine base to show them what he used to do.

"I took them down the hatch, and I was just about overcome when I smelled the old smells," he says with a sheepish laugh. "I realized what a mistake I had made. As corny as it sounds, the Navy is an adventure, and I decided I was still too young to give it up. I've never liked an office yet that wasn't on a submarine."

If there is such a thing, you could call Watson a yuppie warrior. When he isn't at sea playing cat-and-mouse with the Soviet navy for six months at a stretch, he is at home in Norfolk, lovingly restoring a Victorian townhouse in one of the city's most historic areas. He and his wife, Sharon, director of the labor-law division of the Virginia Department of Labor, moved into the integrated, gentrified neighborhood with their daughters, Erica and Lindsay, when he reentered active duty in 1984.

It has been nearly two decades since the summer that Tony Watson spent at home in Cabrini-Green after graduating from Annapolis. For Cabrini-Green and for the Navy, they have been critical decades. The Navy confronted and to a large degree surmounted the racial problems that were prevalent in 1970. But Cabrini-Green has not fared so well, its problems ignored to the point that they have festered and compounded into something worse. There are children in the project with intelligence and talents that would match those of the Watson kids two decades ago, but the barriers facing them may be higher than ever.

"That is something I—and a lot more people—have to do in the future—to get out and reach as many of these kids while they still have a chance, in high school and even before high school," Watson says. "Many of these kids have no hope. You can't dream if you can't see that anybody from here has done anything.

"We need to tell kids there is something on the other side of the mountain. If they could see it, they just might try to climb it. But they don't know what they don't know. A lot of them just don't know there is another side to the mountain."

Blessed all along with good mentors, Watson now feels a responsibility to do some mentoring himself. Within a year of taking command of the Jacksonville, he improved the re-enlistment rate of his crew from 39 to 74 percent. Throughout his career he has pushed his best enlisted men, whatever their race, to consider officer training. Seven who followed his advice were blacks.

Outside the Navy, he often speaks to high school audiences, pitching both for the Navy and for engineering careers, a field in which blacks are relatively underpresented.

Last May he shared top billing as the main speaker with Mayor Richard M. Daley at the Lane Tech's Memorial Day observance. Within minutes of meeting the mayor, Watson had elicited a promise from him to attend an athletic tournament he is helping to stage at Cabrini-Green July 15. Though sometimes uncomfortable with talking about himself and his own accomplishments, he proved once again, at Lane Tech, to be a public speaker of astonishing power. In a performance that few orators can match, he quickly silenced several thousand fidgety high school students into rapt attention. In a patriotic speech that included an account of the death in Vietnam of a Lane Tech classmate of his, he moved many of the students to tears in a consideration of the meaning of wartime sacrifice.

When he visits Chicago, as he tried to do several times a year, Watson always stays with his mother in her rowhouse. He is one of a number of Cabrini-Green alumni who keep coming back, attempting to reach as many kids as they can before the gangs get to them. Watson is a supporter of the Alvin Carter Youth Foundation, an after-school tutoring and sports organization in the project that has succeeded in getting dozens of dropout-prone kids through high school and sending a few of them each year to college.

But what is most important is talking to the kids themselves, he says. During the dedication service for the Peggy Kauffman Friendship House at the Third Baptist Church, Watson says, "This little boy from Cabrini-Green was more afraid than I had ever been in his life the day he arrived at the naval academy." Then, referring to the sword Adm. Kauffman gave him, he says: "Twenty-one years later, I still have that sword, and I'm running as fast as I can to get back to the academy before any of my classmates so that I can keep it. I still believe I can be whatever I want to be, just as you can be. You just have to kick down that door of fear first, the one that you think is blocking the path to your dreams. Just kick it and open it a crack, then keep it open."

After the service, back at Cabrini-Green, Watson just as he always does when he's home, wanders around in his uniform, just talking to the kids. He tries to dazzle them with his experiences, with stories of what his job is, the places he has been, the people he has met.

On a recent visit home, he stops to talk with two boys who live near his mother, 13-year-old twins whom he has gotten to know over the years. They complain to him of the nightly noise made by the "cappers," or snipers, who shoot at one another from the upper stories of highrises across the street from their home.

"You can go to places like South America, Europe, Japan, the North Pole just like I have," he tells the boys, whose studied nonchalance never quite masks their awe of him. "You can be in charge of other men, just like I am. All you have to do is decide that you want to do it and work for it. If either of you manages to get on the honor roll by the time I get back here again, I'll get you out to Norfolk myself and show you what I mean."

"I don't want no football stars, basketball stars or track stars," he continues, dropping into the argot of the projects. "That stuff is okay, but as you get older, it doesn't mean nothing. I want brain stars. Mind stars. What you want to work for is the academic thing, something you can use all of your life.

"You don't have to be no cappers. You can be captains, like me."●

THE ARMENIAN GENOCIDE

● Mr. REID. Mr. President, when future generations read the history of the 20th century, I wonder what they will think of the human misery.

April 24, 1990, represents 75 years since the beginning of just one of those miseries—one that many people would like to deny: the Armenian genocide.

From 1915 to 1923, 1½ million Armenians were killed, and another half million were forced to leave their ancient homeland. To my knowledge, this was the first time in history that the wholesale, systematic elimination of a people became part of a national policy.

This planned extermination perpetrated by the Ottoman Empire against the people of Armenia became a model for the remainder of the 20th century: Hitler, Stalin, Mao, Pol Pot.

But the history of the 20th century may also be read by future generations as a history of denial. Hitler said it best: "Who remembers the Armenians?" Who remembers the Ulrainians? Who remembers the Tibetans? Who remembers the Cambodians? There are even those who would still deny the Jewish Holocaust in Europe.

We have practiced a great deal of denial in this town lately. The Chinese massacre prodemocracy students in Tiananmen Square, and we send high level diplomats to toast their leaders. The Khmer Rouge exterminated over 1 million Cambodians, and this administration strongly supports Prince Norodom Sihanouk who wants to include the Khmer Rouge in a coalition government.

The Ottoman Turks kill 1½ million Armenians, and we say it did not happen. We worry that the Turkish Government will not buy our weapons.

It is right and fitting that we do commemorate the Armenian genocide. It happened. If we forget it happened—if we deny it—genocides will continue to happen. To paraphrase the poet: It is a small world; there is nothing one man will not do to another.●

DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT ACT

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 2006, to create a Department of Environmental Protection in the Executive Cabinet. As a cosponsor of this measure, I am pleased that the House of Representatives has voted overwhelmingly to pass the companion to S. 2006, and that the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs has reported it without opposition. I remain confident of the prompt consideration and passage of this measure in the Senate.

Elevation of the Environmental Protection Agency to Cabinet status is an important step which is long overdue. There are few matters as pressing as the need to protect our air and water resources, to preserve the delicate natural balances of the Earth's climate and ecology, and to place our economy on a sound, sustainable footing. This measure recognizes the increasing importance of coordinating and implementing strong and effective environmental policies which address the many serious threats to the public health posed by environmental degradation.

As we enter the final decade of the century, many of our most serious environmental problems have become international in scope, and require close cooperation between nations. The United States is among the last industrialized nations which have not established a top-level ministry for environmental policy, undermining the EPA Administrator's authority to negotiate international environmental agreements with representatives of other nations. During last summer's economic summit in Paris, the inclusion of environmental matters as a topic for deliberation set the summit apart from the 14 that preceded it. In fact, EPA's participation at the summit reflects a profound shift in our approach to environmental issues, and by placing the agency on an equal footing with the other major Cabinet Departments, we further recognize the increased importance of environmental concerns in the formulation of national and international policies.

Mr. President, protection of our ecological resources, development of new technologies to permit continued economic growth, and international cooperation on environmental matters requires strong commitment and leadership. This legislation is an important step toward the development of a more comprehensive and coordinated approach to environmental conservation issues. I am pleased that the House has acted expeditiously on legislation to create a Department of Environmental Protection and urge my colleagues in the Senate to support this important measure when it comes before the full Senate for debate.●

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA'S BUDGET PROCESS

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, lately there has been some confusion over the Federal Government's influence on and contribution to the budget of the District of Columbia. I would like to take a few minutes today to outline for my colleagues how the District's budget is set and what role the Federal Government plays in that process.

Pursuant to the District of Columbia Self-Government Act (Public Law 93-183), the Mayor's office each year draws up a budget and submits it to the City Council. The Council votes on what to keep and discard from the Mayor's budget and then returns it to the Mayor for submission to Congress.

Here in Congress, the entire budget is treated as an appropriation in both Chambers. And, as is the case for any appropriations bill, final approval of D.C.'s budget requires passage in the Senate and House and the President's signature.

Though Congress and the President exercise their power to appropriate all funds in the District's budget, the Federal contribution—or "Federal payment"—is only a small percentage of the money appropriated (14 percent in fiscal year 1990). The lion's share of the District's revenue is raised from local property, income, and sales taxes.

The Federal payment was established with the city of Washington, DC, in 1800. The payment is compensation for the unique requirements and restrictions placed on the District of Columbia by the Federal Government and for the unique services rendered to the Federal Government by the District of Columbia.

Up until 1925, the Federal payment was set by formula. Since then, the Federal Government and the District have negotiated each year over a lump-sum amount. This year, the President has recommended that the District receive $430.5 million or 12.9 percent of the District's estimated fiscal year 1991 budget.

The relationship between our Federal Government and the District of Columbia is singular. Congress and the administration have chosen to keep control of the entire local budget—those moneys received from the U.S. Treasury as well as those raised locally. I believe that with this decision comes responsibility—the responsibility to understand and respect from what sources the funds we appropriate derive. This brief statement is meant as one step toward fulfilling that responsibility.●

THE GREENVILLE NEWS EDITORIALIZES ON CONGRESSIONAL TERM LIMITATION

● Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, many argue that experience is necessary to legislate effectively. It is important, however, to maintain the distinction between experience and seniority. The reason experience brings legislative effectiveness is because tenure brings seniority. The longer you stay, the more power you command.

And what constitutes "effective legislating?" Today, the average tenure of a committee chairman in the House is 26 years, and in the Senate 20 years. Certainly a quarter of a century must constitute experience. Yet our Nation struggles under the burden of a $3 trillion deficit. Simultaneously, we are constantly bombarded by stories of pork barreling, waste, and imprudent spending. We are not using our experience to legislate effectively.

Mr. President, experience has bred an unresponsive, unrepresentative Congress that busily entrenches itself rather than represents its constituents. I ask that an editorial published on February 26, 1990 in the Greenville News of Greenville, SC be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks, and I urge all Senators to take note.

The editorial follows:

PUBLIC INTEREST GROWS IN 12-YEAR LIMITATION

Washington is practically crawling with interest groups that support particular members of Congress financially and by voter networking, who in turn support the funding and policy goals of the groups. This is one way members of Congress become entrenched in office, and it is one reason House members, for instance, have established a 98 percent re-election rate.

Americans to Limit Congressional Terms, as the name implies, is not such a group. It is devoted to the less charitable mission of enacting a constitutional amendment that would bar all members of Congress from serving more than 12 consecutive years in office.

The idea isn't radical. The president is limited to two four-year terms. Limiting senators to two six-year terms and representatives to six two-year terms would restore a needed balance to what is too often a veto-proof spending machine on Capitol Hill.

Two South Carolinians, former 5th District Rep. Ken Holland and former 1st District Rep. Tommy Hartnett, are among the 33 former members of Congress who endorse the 12-year limitation. They are in overwhelmingly good company. A Gallup Poll last month found that 70 percent of a nationwide sample of American voters agree with the limitation idea.

This is why, after only a few months' effort by the limitation group, legislative resolutions are already pending in 10 states calling on Congress to initiate the needed amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Arguably, it offends good political theory to limit the candidate choice of voters in any way. And there is also concern that congressional staff could become more entrenched and powerful in association with congressional turnover. But still shabbier politics is evident in the prevailing practice of veteran House and Senate members who use their office to stay in office by abusing their free-mail privilege, cornering PAC contributions and favoring various collections of narrow interest groups.

As public concern and interest about this issue grows, it may well be that many challengers and sensitive incumbents will voluntarily pledge to seek election for only 12 years.●

SIMON WARNS WHITE HOUSE ON LITHUANIA

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment to discuss the crisis in Lithuania. Our foreign policy is most successful when the President and Congress act in unison. In a situation like this, Congress usually tries to lend broad support for the President's policy, and so far Congress as a whole has been supportive.

But now that the Soviet Government has cut off virtually all fuel supplies, that unity is less firm. For Congress and the President to act in unison, the President must exert stronger leadership. The President should make it clear that neither economic coercion nor violence are acceptable, period. We should be stronger in urging President Gorbachev and President Landsbergis to sit down and work out an acceptable plan for independence. Yet Moscow has chosen to squeeze the Lithuanians and refuses to meet with Lithuanian delegations. The Lithuanians are being punished for their efforts to regain their independence.

I sense that my colleagues in Congress are as uneasy with a policy of inaction as I am. We should not raise false hopes, but if the Soviet energy blockade continues, if there are no good-faith negotiations with the Lithuanian people, then it is my guess that Congress will lead if the President does not. We ought to say plainly to the Soviet leadership: "This blockade must end." If progress in United States-Soviet relations is to continue, Moscow must promptly begin talking with Vilnius, not at Vilnius.●

1990 NEW JERSEY PRIDE AWARDS

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, in 1985 the New Jersey Pride Award program was established to recognize outstanding individuals who have made many lasting contributions to our State. On May 3 the sixth annual ceremony will be held to honor the 1990 recipients. I want to pay tribute to each of them.

Samuel C. Miller, director of the Newark Museum is being recognized for his contributions to the arts. For over 20 years, Sam has been at the helm of the museum, and under his guidance, it reopened this year after a $20 million renovation. Sam said that he gave a great deal of thought to whether an expensive renovation was justified when there are so many poor and homeless in Newark. But he felt that the money for the museum renovation would give young people an opportunity to learn about the past. Today, thanks in part to Sam's efforts, the Newark Museum is flourishing, and has attracted the art of many private donors.

Eugene Heller, president of Hartz Mountain Industries is this year's economic development honoree. Hartz has developed more than 3 million square feet of commercial, warehouse, retail, and residential space in over just 20 years.

Hartz' waterfront projects, Lincoln Harbor and Independence Harbor have helped redevelop the Hudson River coast in New Jersey. Projects overseen by Gene have increased employment, revived the economy, and instilled pride and encouraged development in our State. His interest in transportation has encouraged many services; including subsidized buses, new highway ramps, bridges, a commuter rail station and re-establishment of commuter ferry services between Hoboken and lower Manhattan.

In the field of Education, Dr. T. Edward Hollander, chancellor of the New Jersey Department of Higher Education is being honored. Since 1977, Ted has led education initiatives to enhance the teaching of technologies and science, and to promote interest in the arts and humanities. He implemented former Governor Kean's "excellence initiatives" program for New Jersey's colleges and universities. During his tenure, the county and State colleges have been strengthened and both Rutgers—the State University, and the University of Medicine and Dentistry have flourished. He has made many lasting contributions to our State's higher education system.

Candace McKee Ashmun, president of the Association of New Jersey Environmental Commissions, is being recognized in the field of energy and environment. She has been instrumental in integrating the consideration of natural resources into the State planning and regulatory system of New Jersey. She is a member of the Pinelands Commission, the State Planning Commission, and the Governor's Council on the Outdoors.

In addition, she has been a director of the Upper Raritan Watershed Association, a member of the New Jersey Natural Resources Council, and a member of the board of trustees of the Middlesex-Somerset-Mercer Regional Study Council.

Dr. Joseph J. Amato, director of pediatric cardiovascular surgery at Childrens Hospital of New Jersey is the recipient of the New Jersey Pride Health Award. This year Joe marked the 10th year of the pediatric cardiovascular surgery program and the admission of the program's 2,000th patient.

Under his direction, New Jersey's only comprehensive neonatal and pediatric care center has become a leading facility in the Nation for the treatment of children and infants with heart disease.

In the field of Science and Technology, inventor Jerry H. Lemelson is being recognized. I understand that Jerry has received more patents than any other active American inventor. This unique individual invented the drive motor used in tape recorders and one of his most recent inventions is a thermometer originally developed for the blind. He is proof that the spirit of invention—the spirit of Edison—is alive and well in New Jersey. Jerry Lemelson, moreover, is committed to the public policy changes necessary to assure the development of future generations of inventors.

Basketball coach, P.J. Carlesimo is the winner of the Sports and Recreation Award. He helped transform Seton Hall into a national power in collegiate basketball. He led the Seton Hall Pirates to the NCAA finals last year, and back to the NCAA tourney again this year.

Terrance and Fay Zealand, founders and executive directors of the AIDS Resource Foundation for Children are recipients of the Social Services Award. Founded in 1987, their organization is dedicated to meeting the needs of children afflicted with AIDS and to lend support to their families. Since its founding, it has helped to open three transitional care facilities.

These facilities provide a home-like setting for children under 6 years old, considered healthy enough not to require hospitalization for the disease. Support services are available for the patients and their families and there is training for foster parents and volunteers. The Zealands have done much to help AIDS' most vulnerable and innocent victims.

Daniel Gaby, chairman of Keyes Martin is being recognized for his contributions to community development. Dan is an advocate for children and is especially interested in helping economically and disadvantaged urban youth. He has given of his time to design and implement many programs for businesses to use to assist the disadvantaged.

He has helped increase awareness in the corporate world of the needs of our State's youth. Dedicated to helping New Jersey's children and adults, he inspires hope that through education and economic opportunities they can have a bright future.

I am also proud to congratulate former governor Tom Kean, the 1990 recipient of the Publisher's Award for Excellence in Public Relations for the State of New Jersey. His campaign, "New Jersey and You—Perfect Together" was a successful one in promoting tourism in our State.

These individuals, outstanding in their fields have made many contributions to our State. I am proud to pay tribute to them, and extend to each my heartiest congratulations on their achievements and my very best wishes for continued success.●

SUMTER, SOUTH CAROLINA SALUTES "HUGO HEROES"

● Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, last autumn, Hurricane Hugo smashed into South Carolina, leaving a path of destruction like nothing seen in my State since the Civil War. In previous floor statements, I have saluted the many heroes to emerge in the wake of Hugo: courageous individuals, public servants who rose magnificently to the occasion, corporations that pitched in with donations and private relief initiatives.

I rise today to report to the Senate on a remarkable expression of gratitude by the people of Sumter, SC, addressed to the countless volunteers from around the Nation who helped get the State of South Carolina back on its feet in the wake of Hugo. This week—which, incidentally, is National Volunteer Week—the people of Sumter will dedicate a living monument to honor the thousands of "Hugo Heroes" who gave so abundantly of their time, energy, and money in the aftermath of the storm.

The idea of creating Volunteer Park was originated by "Volunteer Sumter," a United Way Agency. The project has been embraced wholeheartedly by the people of Sumter, and finally comes to fruition this week. It truly has been a community project. Citizen volunteers cleaned the lot and drew up site plans. Neighboring Shaw Air Force Base provided manpower from their Civil Engineering Squadron to build a gazebo. Sumter garden clubs and master gardeners have planted trees and shrubs and flowers. It is a beautiful and eloquent expression of thanks.

I salute Volunteer Sumter and the entire Sumter community for creating this magnificent park to honor the aptly named "Hugo Heroes." These heroes lent a helping hand to the people of South Carolina at our time of greatest need. On behalf of the entire State, the people of Sumter this week are saying "thank you."●

THANKS TO TEACHERS

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise today to pay tribute to an important program that honors one of America's greatest resources—its teachers. The program is simply and aptly named "Thanks to Teachers."

The sad fact is, we don't say thanks to our teachers often enough. It is the least we can do for the people who play such a crucial role in our society. Our children hold the key to the future, and our teachers hold the key that can open their young minds and make them the kind of parents, workers, and leaders we will need in the 21st century.

The Thanks to Teachers Program does more than just express gratitude for a job well done. It encourages a partnership between classroom teachers and businesses, parents and community leaders. For example, the upcoming national symposium sponsored by the Thanks to Teachers Programs will provide a national forum for teachers and business leaders to discuss school reform policies. The results of the symposium will be distributed to legislators, school policymakers, and media across the country.

This Friday night, Thanks to Teachers will sponsor an awards reception in Memphis where five local winners of a national competition will be honored. Those chosen must have shown outstanding dedication to their profession and their students. They will have an opportunity to attend a Washington leadership institute where they can share their classroom experiences with other teachers from around the country.

I want to take this opportunity to congratulate those Memphis winners in advance. They represent the best in their profession. Along with everyone who participates in this important program, I express my thanks to them for a job well done.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, April 25, 1990

The House met at 12 noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. GEPHARDT).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC,
April 24, 1990.

I hereby designate the Honorable RICHARD A. GEPHARDT to act as Speaker pro tempore on Wednesday, April 25, 1990.

THOMAS S. FOLEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Teach us, O God, to make Your blessing to us, our own blessing; to make Your grace to us, our grace; Your gift of faith, hope, and love to all people, our gift and our treasure. May the abundance of good things, O gracious God, as promised to all humankind, become our own that we may know Your love to us in our hearts and in our very souls. In your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA] to lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mrs. ROUKEMA led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

ALTERNATIVE BUDGET OFFERS A RAY OF HOPE

(Mr. NAGLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NAGLE. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year I described President Bush's budget as a budget of "lost opportunities; a roadmap to nowhere; and in the final analysis, a blueprint for staying the same."

I reached those conclusions reluctantly, but after careful review and study of the budget document he submitted to the Congress.

Today I rise to recognize a ray of hope. An alternative budget, drafted after months of hard work by the House Budget Committee. For they have not retreated from the future. They have acted to help make America ready to meet the future.

It is not perfect. Few products of the legislative process—which aims at compromise, as it inherently must—ever are perfect. For example, I have specific problems with its funding levels for agriculture.

But on balance, I say without hesitation, the Budget Committee plan is light years ahead of President Bush's plan.

For the President says it is enough for America to stay the same. The Budget Committee says that's no way for a great nation to prepare to meet the 21st century.

The President says we can repeat the mistakes of the past. The Budget Committee says it is time for America to invest in itself and get ready to meet the new economic challenges of the 1990's and of the 21st century.

The choice, in my view, is clear.

INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT CHAMORRO

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, today, President Violeta Chamorro will be inaugurated as the first freely elected head of state in Nicaraguan history.

President Chamorro faces an economy ruined by Sandinista mismanagement and a nation divided by civil war. The Sandinistas have left an inauguration gift which includes deeding houses to their supporters, the bargain basement sale of television stations, militant unions ready to paralyze the country, and so-called popular militias well armed from Sandinista stockpiles.

President Chamorro desperately needs United States assistance to consolidate the democratic opening in Nicaragua. Unfortunately, the Congress has delayed, vacillated, and found excuse after excuse not to act. Mr. Speaker, it is embarrassing that the Congress cannot find the political will to definitively end the Contra war and support a democratic future for Nicaragua.

I wish President Chamorro the best of luck in her efforts to make Nicaragua peaceful, free, and prosperous. If Congress does not act, I am afraid luck is the only tool she will have.

BUDGET CHOICES

(Mr. WISE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no comparison, but we will make the comparison between the Bush budget and the House Committee on the Budget version. There is one comparison. The Bush budget has $13.9 billion in revenue enhancements; so does the House budget. The Bush budget has a revenue of $9.1 billion in certain savings; so does the House budget. There the comparison really ends.

If Members believe that Medicare ought to be cut $5.2 billion; that would have closed five rural hospitals in my State of West Virginia alone, then Members should support the Bush budget. If Members believe that seniors should not have to take that kind of medical abuse, then Members support the House budget which cuts only $1.7 billion, the sequestration figure.

If Members believe that there should not be certain investments in the future such as education, Members support the Bush budget. However, if Members believe there should be investment in competitiveness, in initiative, in child care, education, and Head Start, support the House budget. If Members happen to believe there should be more emphasis put on science research, support the House budget. Finally, if Members believe we ought to go about the business of building roads and airports, those things that make America competitive, support the House budget. Do not look to the Bush budget because it cuts money from those items.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear the Bush budget versus the House budget—the House budget wins every time.

CAMPAIGN REFORM

(Mr. KOLBE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, last September the House Republican conference adopted 25 proposals for real and comprehensive campaign reform. We are concerned about the current system of campaign finance. We believe reform is necessary to restore citizen faith and voter participation in the election process. The American public knows reform is needed. They've expressed their outrage over many existing practices.

Mr. Speaker, Republicans are willing and eager to negotiate campaign reform; we recognize that the only way campaign reform legislation will be enacted is through a bipartisan compromise. But in order for negotiations to begin, we need to have a proposal from the other side.

Republicans have proposed limiting special interest PAC's, banning soft money in Federal elections, disclosing and limiting franking, and limiting contributions from outside a candidate's district or State.

We are serious about campaign finance reform. It is vital for the health of the democratic process and for an improved confidence in this institution. Republicans have come to the negotiating table at the appointed hour, we're waiting for the meeting to start.

TAX WITHHOLDING RELIEF FOR SMALL-SCALE FARMERS AND RANCHERS

(Mr. LANCASTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LANCASTER. Mr. Speaker, on Monday of last week millions of Americans filed their income taxes with the Internal Revenue Service. Complying with the income tax requirements of Federal law is one of the burdens that all Americans share with their brothers and sisters who till the land and otherwise bring food to our tables. For most Americans, April 16 marked the end of their Federal paperwork for another year. But for farmers and ranchers, it is just the beginning.

Today, 20 of my colleagues and I are introducing the Wage Withholding Relief for Farmers and Ranchers Act of 1990, to relieve some of our small-scale farmers from one unnecessary burden that was imposed on farmers in the Budget Reconciliation Act of 1989. The act requires farmers to withhold income tax on virtually every agricultural worker they employ, even pickup day laborers who may work less than a week. Prior to the passage of this bill, income tax withholding by agricultural employers was optional only.

The bill does not repeal the provisions that require withholding. Large-scale farmers that typically have the resources to comply with the new mandate would not be affected.

However, the bill would increase the triggers in the new law to a more reasonable level. Current law provides that agricultural employers must withhold income taxes on any employee who receives $150 annually. The bill would increase this amount to $2,400.

In addition, current law requires withholding on all employees if the employer has a total annual payroll of only $2,500. Almost every farmer, except hobby farmers, are caught by this ridiculously low threshold. The bill would increase this amount to a more reasonable $5,000.

Last, since the income tax withholding requirement was patterned after the withholding requirements for Social Security under the FICA, the bill would make conforming amendments to also raise the withholding triggers under that act.

Mr. Speaker, the fact is that the American farmer already has a tremendous paperwork burden. Yes, farmers run a business just like a lot of people in business. But, I would have to say that few businesses have so many different Federal agencies for which they must maintain records, fill out forms, and otherwise correspond on a regular basis. Likewise, few businesses must employ as much seasonal or pickup labor as farmers do during harvest time.

I will not go into great detail, but consider what the average farmer must endure each year. A few simple examples should be considered. First, the Department of Agriculture requires various complicated forms to comply with the intricate commodity and conservation programs. The farmer must cope with set-asides, bases, yields, soil conservation, wetlands, loan and target price formulas, and the like. The Department of Labor also reaches out with forms and paperwork. It requires paperwork be completed for all farm employees. The farmer must also comply with certain health and environmental standards in the employment and housing of these agricultural workers. If the farmer wants to use certain pesticides, they may have to deal with more forms and paperwork as required by the Environmental Protection Agency. If the farmer has land that he would like to drain, then a permit from the Army Corps of Engineers will be needed.

Mr. Speaker, these examples do not even mention the various paperwork and forms that may be required by State and local governments. The list could go on and on.

It's time to provide a little relief for some of our small-scale farmers. I urge my colleagues to support the Wage Withholding Relief for Farmers and Ranchers Act of 1990.

A NEW BEGINNING FOR NICARAGUA

(Mr. GOSS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, about a year ago this body approved an amendment I sponsored to highlight the concern many of us in the Congress felt about the volatile election situation in Nicaragua.

Today as we meet, a new, democratically elected government takes office in Nicaragua, thanks to the continued commitment and good faith not only of the United States, but also of the entire international community and the people of Nicaragua themselves.

As a member of the Organization of American States observer team on hand in Nicaragua in February to witness that nation's first truly democratic election in more than 60 years, I was struck by the dedication and sheer willpower of the Nicaraguan people.

They overcame tremendous odds, economic hardship, threats of retaliation, and the demoralization caused by repeated polls predicting an overwhelming Sandinista victory. Even in the face of such obstacles, the desire for self-determination and a better life prevailed.

I rise today to congratulate Violeta Chamorro and the United Democratic Opposition Party—as the new Government takes office in Nicaragua. I urge my colleagues to take a lesson from the events in Nicaragua—vigilence in the pursuit of free and fair democratic elections has once again proven to be the proper course of United States policy.

THE SUMMIT SHOULD LOOK SOUTH

(Mr. HALL of Ohio asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, the first full summit between Presidents Bush and Gorbachev will be held the end of May. According to the newspapers, there's a lot on the agenda: Reducing nuclear weapons; changes in Eastern Europe; Lithuania; German reunification.

But one crisis isn't on the agenda; for the third time in 7 years, Ethiopia is being treatened by famine brought on by drought. This time, civil war has made getting relief to the hungry people almost impossible. Five million could lose their lives.

The United States has provided hundreds of thousands of tons of food aid, and that's great. The Soviets have pulled out some of their military advisers, and that's great, too. But much more is needed; in a nutshell, more food and less fighting.

Ethiopians are dying from starvation, from malnutrition, and disease. We can't let them die from indifference.

Mr. Speaker, the Bush-Gorbachev summit must look south. They should address the issue of Ethiopian famine and work out an agreement. When two voices speak with as much power as theirs do, they should speak out. The Soviets must be pressed on the issue; they support the Ethiopian Government. Most of the soldiers fight with Soviet weapons, and drop bombs from Soviet planes.

The Ethiopian Government has refused to allow relief aid to move through the Port of Massawa, but without Massawa, nearly half of the famine victims will have no food all summer.

With so much agreement in the air, we ought to agree to work together to deliver food to starving people. We ought to agree to press for a ceasefire, and the opening of Massawa while relief is delivered, and we ought to agree that the lives of suffering people all over the Third World are worth saving.

This kind of agreement ought to be easy to achieve. This kind of agreement would be quite a peace dividend, and it wouldn't cost a penny.

A RAINBOW DAY FOR NICARAGUA

(Mr. LAGOMARSINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, somewhere over the rainbow there is a land where dreams really do come true.

For Nicaragua, today there is a pot of gold at the end of the rainbow—perhaps not the $300 million in United States aid that the other body is disgracefully holding up—but at least the promise of hope that we all so fervently dreamed of.

It is a rainbow day for Nicaragua in more ways than one.

I can imagine that Daniel Ortega is both blue for having been rejected by the majority of Nicaraguans and also green with envy seeing his opponent sworn in today.

For Nicaragua it is that most colorful of days with the Government turning from red to violet.

THE JUNK BOND KING FACES SENTENCING

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, Michael Milken, the junk bond king of Wall Street, sobbed uncontrollably yesterday as he pleaded guilty to six charges.

Poor Mikey. Mike has to pay a $600 million fine. To us that is a lot of cash. To Mike Milken that is mere pocket change, folks.

They say he may have to spend 23 years in jail, but let me tell you something: In America, anybody with that kind of bucks is not going to jail.

The Government has hailed this as a major victory, even though they threw out 92 other charges while this guy has almost wrecked Wall Street and threatened the economy of America as a result of his actions. But I honestly wonder, now that he is left with only a billion dollars, if the judge might not appoint him an attorney.

After all, for Mike Milken a billion dollars is not a lot of bucks, and for all those people out there in jail, I say, "Don't cry over spilled milk. Do your time; you have no choice—you have no money."

DARWINIAN ECONOMICS AT WORK

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, the firing of Dr. Craig Fields as head of the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency [DARPA] signals the triumph of Darwinian economics in this administration. The hands-off-the-economy attitude coming from CEA and from OMB has alerted every corporate predator that America's procurements are wide open for a takeover.

Dr. Fields' crime—according to the Wall Street Journal—was dispensing DARPA funds according to the intent of a statute enacted by the Congress just last session. The Journal article suggests that Dr. Fields was gunned down in the crossfire between the Congress and the powerful heads of CEA and OMB—Mr. Boskin and Mr. Darman. And, I question the current chain of command which places defense agency personnel, DARPA, under the offices of OMB or CEA.

Other recent occasions of ignoring the intent of the law—such as the foreign purchase of Union Carbide's silica production facility in disregard of Exon-Florio—casts a more ominous light on Dr. Fields' firing.

The intent of the Congress with respect to the national defense industrial base has been disregarded. And Dr. Fields' untimely exit from DARPA will serve notice on all agency heads that they too are subject to Darwinian economics—the survival of the cheapest—especially if it's made overseas.

FARMERS HAVE A BIG STAKE IN THE ENVIRONMENT TOO

(Mr. DE LA GARZA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, American farmers and ranchers are working hard to preserve and protect the natural resources on which their livelihood is based—the soil and water.

Five years ago, Congress passed four landmark conservation provisions—sodbuster, swampbuster, the conservation reserve, and conservation planning. These programs have helped us make significant strides to protect our soil and water resources.

I will soon introduce a comprehensive package of conservation and environmental measures for the 1990 farm bill. My goal is to enable America's farmers to take the next logical steps in this process.

My proposal will establish for the first time a comprehensive approach to address the conservation and environmental issues that affect agriculture today.

My proposal builds upon the successful foundation laid by the Conservation Reserve Program. It will establish an agricultural wetlands reserve, encourage the adoption of more environmentally sound practices to clean up our water, and expand our efforts to protect wildlife habitat.

It will also encourage integrated crop management and adoption of agricultural resource planning by farmers. And it will provide for increased tree planting in rural areas.

I am also proposing establishment of an Office of Environmental Quality at the Department of Agriculture, to ensure that all USDA programs affecting the environment are given the highest priority.

I believe my legislative package will allow us to properly balance our twin objectives of maintaining the economic health of agriculture and protecting our natural resources.

No one is closer to the land than the farmer who works it from sunup to sundown, who draws his drinking water from it, and who enjoys the blessings of it every day. No one else has a bigger stake in protecting that land and the environment today and for future generations than American farmers.

JOIN THE REPUBLICANS IN PASSING CAMPAIGN REFORM

(Mr. BUECHNER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Speaker, for the past 1½ years, there has been a steady call for campaign reform legislation. In response to this call, House

Republicans issued a 25-point campaign reform package. We have a clear position on campaign reform but the Democrats have yet to take any public positions on this pressing subject.

House Republicans have proposed substantive measures to end many of the abuses inherent in Federal campaign law. Some of the reforms we support include: A total ban on soft money; an end to the practice of gerrymandering, which denies citizens a chance at equal representation in Washington; full and complete disclosure of all activities taken on behalf of a Federal candidate, which will give the public a better idea of who is financing a candidate's election; and putting an end to the practice of using forced union dues to pay for political activities.

House Republicans are committed to real campaign reform—not a watered-down package of half reforms. Mr. Speaker, the need for reform is obvious. The public views Congress as a self-serving bureaucracy handing out favors to our highest campaign contributors. Competition has ceased to exist in most congressional districts—the reelection rate in the past two elections was over 98 percent. This lack of competition has turned the House of Representatives into a House of Lords, where the only way Members are removed from office is through death, retirement, or scandal.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party is ready to go to work and make positive changes in Federal election law. We urge you and your party to join us in a bipartisan effort on campaign reform.

THE POLITICS OF THE CLEAN AIR BILL

(Mr. APPLEGATE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, is the Clean Air bill going too far? Let me read a few excerpts from the Wall Street Journal of December 5.

* * * The President and congressional Republicans have stiffed their business allies on the Clean Air bill * * * but equally apparent is that the Democrats in Congress have also stiffed their normal constituencies—the poor and the working class, especially industrial workers * * *.

Small businesses are owned by and employ people loyal to both parties. And though they are screaming that the Clean Air bill's provisions won't crush many of them, they have been ignored * * *.

* * * Many local voters are learning that the huge amounts they spent to rip out asbestos from school systems was a pointless environmental fiasco. Over the 20 years voters have spent billions to pay for catalytic converters, smokestacks, retrofits, and other effective environmental technologies, and by any measure the American environment is cleaner. Automobile tail pipe emissions, for example, are 96 percent cleaner, and 90 percent in the smokestacks.

So, Mr. Speaker, what I am saying is, "Let's take a look, and let's not be fooled by what's going on, and let's not give up our jobs and our economy just for the sake of having purified air, which is impossible to get."

AMENDING THE INSPECTOR GENERAL ACT OF 1978

(Mr. CONTE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, today I introduced a bill amending the Inspector General Act of 1978.

When we passed the act we wanted tenacious watchdogs with teeth sharp enough to prevent and detect fraud in the programs and operations of Federal agencies. And that's what we got until last year.

That is when the Department of Justice issued a ruling sending shock waves throughout the IG community and turning our watchdogs into lap dogs.

It said the IG's should only conduct investigations concerning Federal dollars and Federal employees, not regulatory agencies. Removing trillions of dollars in federally regulated programs from the watchful eye of the IG's.

That ruling is unjustified. Our act directed the IG's to "prevent and detect" fraud in programs and operations of Federal agencies—meaning anyone receiving Federal benefits, loans, licenses, or other preferred status, not just Federal funds and employees.

The act didn't split hairs over what investigations the IG's could undertake. Only the Department of Justice has split jurisdictional hairs by meddling in the IG's affairs.

If Justice had followed the maxim, "don't fix what isn't broken" we wouldn't have this problem. Because of their meddling, much fraud will go untouched and thousands of criminal investigations won't be conducted. Our citizens will lose while criminals celebrate.

The problem with the IG's is like buying a watchdog to protect your property.

You can let the dog instinctively do its job or muzzle it and lock it in the basement. The OLC ruling has muzzled the IG's. The bill I am introducing will put the guard dogs back on guard.

THE STORY OF THE TWO JIM BRADYS

(Mr. FEIGHAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to tell the story of two Jim Bradys. The Jim Brady I know was tragically wounded 9 years ago during the assassination attempt on President Reagan.

Since that time he has struggled to overcome physical disabilities left by a bullet to his brain. More recently, he has come to Congress urging swift passage of a 7-day waiting period bill, saying: "I do not want to see another Jim Brady." Well, unfortunately, we have seen another.

The other Jim Brady, James Calvin Brady, opened fire in an Atlanta mall yesterday. He smiled as he killed Michael Gregory Music and wounded four others.

On Monday he was released from a mental hospital and bought a gun. On Tuesday he went to an Atlanta mall and began shooting. One Jim Brady was an innocent bystander, maimed by a lunatic with access to a handgun. The other was a lunatic, with easy access to a handgun, who killed an innocent bystander.

What ties these two men together is not their names. It is that both of their tragedies could easily have been prevented. All it would have taken is 7 days. Fill out a form, answer a few simple questions, and wait 7 days to purchase a gun. Is that too much to ask to prevent horrors like the one yesterday?

I do not want to see another Jim Brady. We must pass the Brady bill to guarantee that criminals and mental incompetents are barred from buying handguns and killing innocent people. There is no time to waste: Lives are at stake and we can save them.

THE CONTRACEPTION INFERTILITY RESEARCH CENTERS ACT

(Mrs. JOHNSON of Connecticut asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. JOHNSON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of a bill introduced by the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] and the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER], the Contraception Infertility Research Centers Act.

Mr. Speaker, abortion is an issue that has deeply divided this body and our society. We are divided on that issue because we are not addressing the real issue, which is to provide women with the right choice, the choice to not only prevent pregnancy, but prevent pregnancy in a way that is in harmony with the religious beliefs of each of the women of America. We have prevented that responsible choice by preventing contraceptive research.

Mr. Speaker, 30 years ago there were 17 companies doing research on contraception in America. Today there is one. Think of how science has changed in 30 years.

Why are we denying advances that would allow women to make the most responsible of all choices, the choice not to get pregnant if they are not prepared for the decades of responsibility that starting a family entails?

Let us all join those on both sides of this issue behind this bill.

THE SOVIET BLOCKADE OF LITHUANIA

(Mr. DURBIN asked and was given permission to address the House and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DURBIN. Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States who are concerned about the future and independence of Lithuania waited with great expectation yesterday for the announcement by President Bush of the position of the United States of America when it comes to the independence and freedom of this courageous nation. The decision by President Bush and congressional leaders to stand mute as Lithuania is choked by the Soviet Union is a source of shame to our Nation.

Mr. Speaker, the United States is abandoning its historic commitment to human rights. We are turning our backs on the principle of self-determination, and we are ignoring a 50-year commitment to Baltic independence.

This morning I spoke by telephone with the President of Lithuania, Dr. Vytautus Landsbergis. I will tell my colleagues what the situation is today in Lithuania.

My colleagues, 8,000 Lithuanians are unemployed because of the Soviet embargo. They estimate 75,000 will be unemployed in the next several weeks. Spring planting has been delayed because of the lack of fertilizer. Drugs and medicine are not available in the hospitals. Serious shortages of oxygen have taken place in these hospitals as well.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first Soviet blockade to kill the force of freedom, but in 1948, when the Soviets blockaded Berlin, President Truman did not sit back, take a poll and wring his hands. The United States stepped forward with an airlift that saved Berlin and inspired freedom-loving people around the world to continue to look to the United States for leadership.

I say to President Bush, "Mr. President, if you can't bring yourself to condemn Soviet coercion of Lithuania, can the United States at least offer a helping hand with humanitarian assistance for the struggling people of this courageous nation?"

ELECTION REFORM—GUARANTEED IN NICARAGUA BUT HOW ABOUT HERE?

(Mr. DREIER of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN], my friend, I, too, am concerned about developments in Lithuania. However, Mr. Speaker, I must say that today marks a very important day in the struggle for freedom around the world.

On December 13 of 1987, Daniel Ortega said:

> If we hold an election in Nicaragua, and by chance the Sandinistas were to lose, we will give up the government, but we will never give up power.

Well, Mr. Speaker, we are today witnessing the transition of power in Nicaragua.

I congratulate the people of Nicaragua. I congratulate Ronald Reagan, George Bush, President Arias, those on both sides of the aisle who have encouraged the negotiation process in Nicaragua, for bringing about a very, very successful resolution to a decade-long struggle.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but think about a struggle which we are facing right here in the Congress as we congratulate the people of Nicaragua. The people of Nicaragua are guaranteed election campaign reform, and yet we in the House are having a difficult time trying to implement the 25 recommendations that have been put together under the leadership of the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS]. I hope very much that we are able to move ahead with effective election reform.

BETTER RESEARCH ON CONTRACEPTION AND INFERTILITY NEEDED

(Mr. McDERMOTT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McDERMOTT. Mr. Speaker, our country is presented with an increasingly tragic paradox:

Every year, 3 million women face unplanned pregnancies.

At the same time, one out of six couples in the United States who want to conceive cannot do so.

The United States has fallen behind in research on contraception and infertility.

Currently there is only one pharmaceutical firm in the United States conducting any contraceptive research.

If we want to reduce teenage pregnancy, control the spread of sexually transmitted diseases, and encourage family planning in other parts of the world, we must support the research and development of new and more effective birth control alternatives. And if we want to help couples desperately trying to conceive, we must support the basic research that will find new treatments for infertility.

Women—who must bear the consequences of unsafe and unreliable reproductive techniques—deserve better contraceptive choices. So do men.

My colleagues Representatives SCHROEDER and SNOWE have introduced the Contraceptive and Infertility Research Centers Act to answer these needs. I commend them on their initiative, and I urge my colleagues to support their efforts.

FLIGHT ATTENDANT SAFETY PROFESSIONALS' DAY

(Mr. DEFAZIO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. DEFAZIO. Mr. Speaker, every day more than a million Americans take to the skies and fly commercial airlines. My colleagues in the House here know well, most of us travel back and forth to our districts every week, but how many of those million Americans or how many of us here in this House recognize the key role that flight attendants play in the comfort and safety of our travel. So many times the flight attendants have been the heroes and heroines of airplane crashes by helping to save many, many lives.

It is time that we gave them the recognition that they are due, that we just stop one day this year to give them some recognition for a job well done. Let us never take another flight attendant for granted. Now is the time to recognize the important role they play.

Please cosponsor a bipartisan resolution, House Joint Resolution 533, designating July 19, 1990 as "Flight Attendant Safety Professionals' Day."

CONTRACEPTION AND INFERTILITY RESEARCH CENTERS ACT

(Ms. SNOWE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, this morning Congresswoman SCHROEDER and I testified at a Health Subcommittee hearing on our Contraception and Infertility Research Centers Act. I sought to answer a reasonable question: Why should the Federal Government fund contraception research?

The plain fact is that, in the United States, contraceptives fail far too often, and these failures are of enormous public consequence.

There are the estimated 600,000 abortions annually which stem from unwanted pregnancies caused by contraceptive failure. As one professor put it, "Many people ignore the fact that the incidence of abortion reflects the state of contraception."

Or there is the $19.3 billion annual price tag for Government assistance to families begun by teen mothers, and the fact that 27 percent of all abortions in this country are performed on teens.

Yet privately funded contraceptive research is minimal, and so no fundamentally new methods have been introduced in the United States since the pill and IUD in the early 1960's.

By establishing the research centers and incentives we propose in our bill, contraception options can be safely expanded: thus improving the lives of millions of American women and families; reducing substantial strains on our society; and, importantly, providing a forum for agreement, rather than acrimony, for those with differing views on abortion.

SUPPORT URGED FOR LEGISLATION TO CREATE A MANDATORY 7-DAY WAITING PERIOD FOR HANDGUN PURCHASES

(Mr. LEWIS of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEWIS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Tuesday, April 24, a man entered a shopping mall in Atlanta and opened fire. A 24-year-old man was killed and four other people were wounded.

When he was arrested, police found a document stating that the man had just been released from a Georgia mental institution. The day after his release, he walked into a pawnshop and bought a revolver and 12 rounds of hollow-point ammunition—a type designed to expand on impact and cause severe wounds.

Mr. Speaker, this tragedy might have been avoided if legislation mandating a 7-day waiting period for handgun purchases was in effect. The National Association of Police Organizations and other law enforcement organizations are pleading for action on this legislation.

H.R. 467 would make it impossible for a person to leave a mental institution one day and purchase a handgun the next day. I hope my colleagues will agree that the time has come to deny the easy access to handguns which has lead to much violence and too many killings.

WHAT WILL AIR FORCE PROPOSE NEXT ON B-2 STEALTH BOMBER?

(Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ROWLAND of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, in our continuing effort to inform the American people about the cost and the problems of the B-2 bomber, today I would like to take a moment to bring to the attention of the Members the latest.

Yesterday's Los Angeles Times carried the news that the Air Force is prepared to abandon the MX Rail Garrison Program and to slow the development of the Midgetman Missile Program in order to continue funding for the B-2 Stealth bomber.

I can only guess that the logic at work here is, "If you can't put a pilot in it, it's expendable."

This proposal makes about as much sense as the last proposal to use the B-2 bomber to conduct air attack missions of the ATA, the advanced tactile aircraft. That proposal was as desperate as it was absurd. This proposal, which would effectively dismantle our strategic land forces, is equally desperate and absurd.

I am very interested to hear what the Air Force will try next. Perhaps to lease the B-2 bomber to Federal Express, or to Emery, or UPS, for the fastest stealthiest, and most expensive day-to-day delivery system.

Mr. Speaker, I am strongly for negotiating with the Soviets to reduce our strategic arsenals, but this latest proposal makes a mockery out of our own United States negotiating position.

WE NEED AN OBJECTIVE NATIONAL DEFENSE PLAN ON BASE CLOSINGS

(Mr. MAZZOLI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, because of the excellent sleuthing of our colleague, the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] the Nation now has a revised list before it of bases which are slated for closure by the U.S. Navy. Some bases have been added to the list that was disclosed in January and some bases have been dropped.

Unfortunately, the Naval Ordnance Station in Louisville in my district remains on the endangered list, though I have every hope that the Navy will soon find that that base should be kept open.

The good news is that by letter dated April 5 from David Berteau of the Logistics Department of the Department of Defense, the Navy will not seek to close bases including naval ordnance by squeezing off its air and water supply, by cutting down on the money going to it, but they will proceed under current law.

The bad news is that, while I know bases need to be closed in this new world we live in, the bad news is that current law, which is not objective in my judgment and does not provide an overall national defense picture, needs to be changed.

I would urge our colleagues to give close attention to the bill which has been drafted by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ASPIN], the chairman of our Armed Services Committee. I think that bill does give the opportunity for closing bases where they need to be closed, but keeping bases open where they need to be kept open.

We need a national defense plan. We also need to be sure that that is objective.

OUTRAGEOUS SECRECY PRACTICE ON DISCHARGE PETITIONS

(Mr. INHOFE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. INHOFE. Mr. Speaker, I applaud the efforts of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. DOUGLAS] in providing the leadership to stop a practice that has been going on since 1931. In 1931 a precedent was set in this House that allows people to sign a discharge petition, and yet that must be kept in secret until the number of 218 is reached.

In 1987, when 85 percent of Americans said they wanted a budget balancing amendment to the Constitution, there were 240 coauthors, and yet the maximum number of signatures we could get on a discharge petition that would take it out of committee was 170. That means that 70 Members of Congress went home and said that they coauthored the resolution for a budget balancing amendment to the Constitution, and yet they really did not want it and they would not sign the discharge petition.

We introduced a bill today, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. DOUGLAS] and myself, to stop this practice. Now is the time to open the doors of Government. I think the people at home are entitled to know how we really feel about these critical issues.

TRIBUTE TO SYRACUSE POLICE DEPARTMENT DEPUTY CHIEF HERMAN EDGE

(Mr. WALSH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, it is often said that only in death do we recognize the greatness of an individual, yet their legacy lives on forever.

Last week the city of Syracuse Police Department lost one of its most respected members and highest ranking officers, Deputy Chief Herman Edge. His passing was not caused by violence connected to his profession, but to the illness that takes the lives of far too many citizens of this Nation, cancer.

Chief Herman Edge was a very special person, respected and admired by his community. He was known in the highest sense of the term as a "good cop." Here was a man who had risen through the ranks of the department over a 33-year period to become its highest ranking black officer. He achieved this position because of his hard work, dedication, and professionalism.

What made this strong but gentle man a giant in his community? It was his care and concern for the people he served. Rich or poor, black or white, young or old—it made no difference to Chief Edge. If you had a problem and he could help, just ask and he would be there for you. What more could a community ask of one man?

Last Wednesday at his funeral in Syracuse, almost every seat in the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception was filled with mourners who wished to pay their final respects to this man. The chief would have been both pleased and proud to see so many of his friends in attendance. He probably would have also asked, why all the fuss over me?—I am just another person like you. But we all knew he was not. He was a very special man.

Our community has lost a great citizen, and to his family and friends I extend my deepest sympathy. We were all blessed to have known Chief Edge. He served his community and country well.

LITHUANIA WANTS FREEDOM, INDEPENDENCE, AND RECOGNITION

(Mr. SARPALIUS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SARPALIUS. Mr. Speaker, as we see the Lithuanians struggle for independence, we must ask ourselves: Why do they want independence? Why do they not want to stay with communism?

We must look at the history of the Lithuanians. At the end of the war, 50 years ago when the Soviets took over that little country, they gathered everybody who admitted that they had a belief in their God, they gathered everybody who had any education, training, or skills, and they executed them. They killed one-third of their population, murdering 350,000 people in one execution. So we can understand their bitterness toward the Communist Party.

For the past 50 years, every President in this country has never, ever recognized the presence of the Soviet Union in Lithuania until today.

Once we denied recognition for that country, once we denied independence for that country, we have, in a sense, now changed policy from the past 50 years that the Presidents have set in this country. Our President now says that we recognize the presence of the Soviet Union in Lithuania.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues, friends, to continue to keep their hope and courage and faith for that small country who wants what we have, and it is freedom and independence and recognition.

A CALL FOR FAIR, BALANCED, BIPARTISAN CAMPAIGN REFORMS

(Mr. UPTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. UPTON. Mr. Speaker, many of the Members who supported the pay increase and ethics reform legislation adopted in this House last year did so for two reasons: the bill eliminated the grandfather clause, so that Members could no longer keep excess campaign funds for their personal use; and the Speaker of the House promised that if the measure were passed, it would be an important first step toward campaign finance reform. The agreement was that the Speaker would see that a bipartisan, comprehensive bill would reach the floor before the end of this Congress. I can personally recall Members making commitments to support the ethics reform bill precisely for those reasons.

So what has happened with the Speaker's promise now? We in the minority no longer know what the Speaker has in mind. Will the legislation contain any of the proposals we in the minority have sought—proposals that would limit incumbents' advantages, promote real competition in House races, and enhance the role of individual voters in the process? Will we get a chance to see the majority's proposals more than a day before it gets to the floor?

Everyone in this House—and throughout the country—knows how important campaign reform is. We also know that, in order for it to truly serve the principles of our democracy, it must be fair to both parties, and to all of our Nation's voters. That it can only be achieved in a climate of mutual trust and collegiality. Therefore I urge the Speaker to keep the promise he made during the ethics reform and pay increase debate last year—bring us a fair, balanced, and bipartisan package of campaign reforms that we can all support before the end of the 101st Congress.

NEED FOR A FAMILY AND MEDICAL LEAVE POLICY

(Mr. KENNEDY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, our society has witnessed a number of changes over the past couple decades which reinforce why we need a family and medical leave policy. The fact is that, due to medical advances, people age 85 and older are the faster growing segment of our population. So now, the average American woman, but women in particular, can expect to spend 17 years taking care of her children but 18 years taking care of her parents. Yet despite this fact, the United States is the only industrialized nation, besides South Africa, that does not guarantee unpaid leave for its citizens.

Debra Drewek is a nurse from Boston, MA, who needed family leave to go care for her father who was diagnosed with terminal bone cancer in Milwaukee. After unsuccessful efforts to arrange for home care for her father, Debra requested a leave of absence from her job. Her employer denied her request and Debra had no choice but to quit, selling everything she had to go to Milwaukee. Two months later, Debra's father died. Had family leave been available to her, she would have been able to return to her job. I urge the leadership to bring the Family and Medical Leave Act to the floor so we can give folks like Debra the peace of mind that comes from job and family security.

DO NOT MAKE MISTAKE OF FORGETTING LITHUANIA

(Mr. BURTON of Indiana asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if President Bush were here now, this is what I would say to him: "Mr. President, I support you 95 percent of the time, but Lithuania cannot wait any longer. The Soviet pressure, although not a direct military attack like that which they used to crush Hungary in 1956, nevertheless will crush this small captive nation if we do not put any pressure on the Soviets and put it on them now. Today, President Landsbergis of Lithuania denounced your decision not to impose sanctions against the Soviets as another Munich. He also said, 'We were afraid that America would sell us down the river.' Mr. President, that is the way it appears to Americans and to the rest of the world."

We must act now before it is too late.

I have listed 11 things America can do to put pressure on the Soviets among which are recognize Lithuanian independence, suspend negotiations with the Soviets on bilateral trade, oppose most-favored-nation status for the Soviets, and there is much more we can do, Mr. President.

We pretty much forgot about China and Tiananmen Square. We must not make that mistake again by forgetting Lithuania.

DEPOSITORY INSTITUTION MONEY LAUNDERING AMENDMENTS OF 1990

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 378 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 378

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3848) to require the appropriate Federal depository institution regulatory agency to revoke the charter of any Federal institution which is found guilty of a crime involving money laundering or monetary transaction report offenses and to require the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the National Credit Union Administration Board to terminate the deposit insurance of any State depository institution which is found guilty of any such crime, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and the amendment made in order by this resolution and which shall not exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the five-minute rule, each section shall be considered as having been read, and all points of order against said substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7 of rule XVI are hereby waived. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCDERMOTT). The gentlewoman from New York [Ms. SLAUGHTER] is recognized for 1 hour.

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, for the purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN], and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 378 is the rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990.

This is an open rule providing for 1 hour of general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

The rule makes in order the amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purposes of amendment under the 5-minute rule. Each section of the substitute shall be considered as read.

Further, the rule waives all points of order against the substitute for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 7 of rule XVI, which prohibits nongermane amendments. This waiver is required because the committee substitute incorporates provisions from H.R. 3939 and H.R. 4044, in addition to those originally in H.R. 3848 in order to form a complete and comprehensive package to combat money laundering.

Finally, the rule provides for one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3848, the bill for which the committee has recommended this rule, is designed to bolster our efforts to curb money laundering. Up to $100 billion in illegal drug profits are laundered each year. In addition, the Internal Revenue Service estimates that tax cheats launder as much as $50 billion annually from legitimate businesses to avoid paying taxes.

H.R. 3848 would stiffen penalties against financial institutions convicted of money laundering by allowing the revocation of the institutions' charters and the termination of their deposit insurance. Any individual convicted of money laundering would not be allowed to affiliate with financial institutions in the future. Other sections of this legislation will require final Treasury regulations to ensure proper recordkeeping of international funds transfers and increase the civil penalties for violations of money-laundering laws.

Mr. Speaker, this is an open rule which will allow full and fair debate on the provisions of this important bill. I ask my colleagues to support the rule so that we may proceed with consideration of the merits of this legislation.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 378 is a rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 3848, Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990. I consider it a rate pleasure and an honor to be managing this rule, because it is a straight open rule. I commend the Committee on Rules for making this the fourth consecutive open rule. This boosts the percentage of open rules in the Congress to 58 percent of the total rules granted. That is the highest percentage of open rules since the 98th Congress in 1983 and 1984, when 68 percent of the rules were open. We do still have a way to go to surpass that record.

Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the rule the bill will be subject to 1 hour of general debate, equally divided between the chairman and ranking Republican of the Committee on Banking. The rule then makes in order the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute now printed in the bill as original text for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. Speaker, the rule waives clause 7 of rule 16, the germaneness rule, against the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. This is necessary because the substitute combines the texts of three different money laundering bills into a single bill and therefore goes beyond the scope of the bill as introduced. I would emphasize, however, that the substitute is printed in the bill now before Members, and the report of the committee, which has been available for well over a week now, addresses the provisions of the substitute. So there is nothing new being sprung on Members at the last minute under this germaneness waiver.

The rule goes on to provide that each section of the bill shall be considered as having been read. Separate votes may be demanded in the House on any amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or substitute. And finally, the rule provides for one motion to recommit, with or without instructions. That preserves the minority's traditional right to offer a recommittal motion of its own choosing.

Mr. Speaker, not only is this rule noncontroversial, but the bill it makes in order was reported from the Banking Committee by a vote of 49 to 0, and it has the strong support of the administration.

Mr. Speaker, you and I are both from Illinois and know that the original bill was introduced by the gentleman from our great State of Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO]. I thought the gentleman might find it interesting that both of us would concur in this ability to garner votes, because on page 25 of the report we will find that the bill passed out of committee 94 to nothing, a rate tribute in a committee with 49 members. Now, some may suggest it was a transposition. I say it is due to the skill of the chairman.

H.R. 3848 would require the appropriate Federal depository institution regulatory agency to revoke the charter of any institution under its jurisdiction which is found guilty of money laundering or monetary transaction report offenses. The bill also requires the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the National Credit Union Administration Board to terminate the deposit insurance of any institution found guilty of any such crime.

Mr. Speaker, I don't want to step on the toes of the Banking Committee by explaining the bill further during debate on this rule. I do, however, want to commend the committee on bringing out such a strong, bipartisan bill that has the full backing of the administration. This legislation hits the drug dealers and their collaborators where it really hurts—right in their pocketbooks.

The American people consider drugs to be the No. 1 problem facing this Nation. This bill builds on the anti-money laundering provisions of the last two drug acts, and consequently bolsters the arsenal of weapons available to combat that problem. I therefore urge my colleagues to support this open rule and then to pass this meritorious piece of legislation.

At this point in the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert the lastest data on open and restrictive rules.

Original jurisdiction measures reported as privileged are also not counted.

[2] Open rules are those which permit any Member to offer any germane amendment to a measure so long as it is otherwise in compliance with the rules of the House.

[3] Restrictive rules are those which limit the number of amendments which can be offered, and include so-called modified open and modified closed rules, as well as completely closed rules, and rules providing for consideration in the House as opposed to the Committee of the Whole.

Note.—The above data differs slightly from that published in previous Congresses because it is based on a rule-by-rule examination and not just on summary tables from committee surveys for the 95th–99th Congresses as was previously done. Moreover, appropriations rules (which only provide for waivers) and original jurisdiction measures are no longer counted.

Prepared by the Minority Counsel, Subcommittee on the Legislative Process, Committee on Rules.

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO].

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my deep appreciation to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN]. She was raised in the congressional district that I have the privilege to represent, and consequently she really learned at an early age how to count.

Mr. Speaker, drugs are the black plague of America. Everywhere we look, we see the victims of drugs. For each of the past 6 years, emergency room episodes are up for cocaine, up for heroin, up for marijuana, up for PCP. Between 1984 and 1988, cocaine-related deaths have increased 1,000 percent.

The profits in the drug trade is tremendous. Smuggle 220 pounds of cocaine from South America into the United States and you make a $1 million profit. Divide it up and sell it on the street and make another $5 million in illegal profits. Cocaine, worth three or four times its weight in gold, and sold to addicts who can never get enough, quickly generates staggering amounts of money.

No one knows how much money is involved in the drug trade. Estimates of the size of the drug trade in the United States range from $100 to $150 billion annually. Worldwide, estimates range up to $300 billion.

How are these drugs paid for? They are paid for in only one way—and that is with cash. Drug dealers do not take checks and they do not take credit cards. They take cash, lots of cash.

Consider the case of Rayful Edmond, who was recently convicted of drug trafficking in Washington. His operation accounted for about $20 million in sales a month. Put another way, he received $650,000 a day, every day of the year.

Yet, when it came time to sentence him, the prosecutors were unable to show where the money had gone. They could track some of it to his cocaine suppliers and some to employees, but even after those expenses, he was left with over $200,000 a day for his personal profit.

The fact that Rayful Edmond was able to somehow hide over $200,000 a day—$1½ million per week—shows just how important money laundering is to drug dealers. Rayful Edmond, like so many other drug dealers, has managed, with the help of money launderers, to keep his profits from being seized.

We must stop money laundering. The profits of the drug business are used to buy more drugs, to pay for hired killers, and to corrupt public officials.

H.R. 3848 is aimed directly at the worst aspects of money laundering. The legislation contains a death penalty provision for financial institutions that launder money. Any financial institution which is convicted on money laundering, along with two or more of its officers or directors, will be subject to a public hearing by its Federal regulator. The regulator will have the authority to revoke the charter of the institution. This is a very tough penalty, but money laundering for drug dealers is an awful crime. We need financial institutions to take deposits and make loans, not provide services for cocaine kings.

The legislation will also ban from banking, for life, any bank employee or official convicted of money laundering. There are enough honest people in the world to work in banks. We do not need money laundering banks or money laundering bank employees. This legislation will get rid of them.

This legislation is an important part of Congress' attack on the drug business. I am proud to be the sponsor of this legislation and proud that the Financial Institutions Subcommittee, which I chair, worked so hard on this legislation.

The chairman of the Full Banking Committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] and the distinguished ranking minority member of both the subcommittee and the full committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] are also to be commended for their leadership and work in crafting a good, strong bill.

I urge the House to adopt the rule so that the House may consider this legislation aimed at money laundering.

□ 1300

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE], the Republican leader of the committee.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the rule today. As an open rule, it provides a fair and appropriate way to consider H.R. 3848.

This money laundering bill is the result of a lot of bipartisan hard work at both the subcommittee and the full committee level, and I want to commend Chairman ANNUNZIO for his strong leadership role. I would also commend Chairman GONZALEZ for his expeditious action in bringing the bill to the floor today.

This bill is the product of many hearings held by the distinguished chairman of the Financial Institutions Subcommittee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], as well as hearings in San Antonio, the hometown of Chairman GONZALEZ.

Though I support an open rule, I consider the bill that came out of the committee a good and reasonable legislative product, and I would oppose any amendments which would change the product which has had this bipartisan effort, and which is now strongly supported by the administration. I am particularly concerned about possible changes in the wire transfer provisions.

H.R. 3848 provides that by January 1, 1991, the Treasury Department must come up with regulations requiring certain banks to record additional information about international wire transfers. This is an extremely complex area, and micromanaging banking and treasury operations by legislation would be premature at best, in my judgment. The Treasury Department and the Federal Reserve have requested that we not put burdensome requirements on all institutions that engage in wire transfers. I think we should allow Treasury time to proceed with developing its regulations, considering the fact that there are over 100 million international wire transfers every year, and it may not be possible, or even desirable, to have all of them publicly reported.

Again, I support the rule and hope we can pass this bill as another step in providing even stronger sanctions against money laundering.

Again, I thank the gentlewoman for yielding time to me.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to yield back the remainder of my time.

Ms. SLAUGHTER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 378 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H.R. 3848.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3848) to require the appropriate Federal depository institution regulatory agency to revoke the charter of any Federal depository institution which is found guilty of a crime involving money laundering or monetary transaction report offenses and to require the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the National Credit Union Administration Board to terminate the deposit insurance of any State depository institution which is found guilty of any such crime, with Mr. HUGHES in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the bill is considered as having been read the first time.

Under the rule, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO].

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990.

This legislation, which I authorized, contains a powerful incentive not to take part in money laundering. That incentive is a very simple one. Under the legislation, any bank convicted of money laundering stands the risk of being placed into conservatorship. Any financial institution that is convicted of money laundering, along with two or more of its officers or directors, stands to have its charter revoked. In plain language, these provisions hold out the death penalty for the management and for any financial institution itself convicted of money laundering.

Our Nation faces a tremendous drug problem. Pick up a newspaper from any American city, large or small, and on any day you will find a story about drug arrests, drug use, or drug killings. We can no longer tolerate this scourge. The war on drugs must be fought by all. There can be no exemptions for banks or bankers.

We put the street dealer in jail and we put the drug kingpin in the penitentiary, but no one has found a way to imprison a bank. Fines and forfeitures have proven totally inadequate. Of the 60 banks convicted of money laundering since 1982, 25, almost half, were fined $10,000 or less. When you consider that a money launderer can earn $10,000 laundering just a single day's take for a drug dealer, you realize just how inadequate mere fines are and how lucrative money laundering is.

The big profits turn the fines into, simply, a very small cost of doing business.

A recent report about a bank accused of money laundering shows how lax bank management can be even when money laundering is brought to management's attention. An employee went to the bank's general counsel and hinted that he may have been involved in money laundering with a bank customer. The bank's immediate reaction was to hire lawyers to defend both the bank and the employee, even though authorities had not yet contacted the bank, rather than investigate the matter or notify authorities of the possible crime. Even after prosecutors began investigating the bank, and for 3 months after the customer was convicted of money laundering, the employee was kept on the payroll.

For 18 months bank management claimed the employee, and by implication, the bank, were innocent of money laundering. Finally, the employee was convicted of money laundering, and prosecutors are now deciding whether to indict the bank. Only then did the bank seek to plea bargain its way out of trouble by offering to plead guilty to a misdemeanor, and quietly receive a slap on the wrist.

During all this period there was no indication that the bank sought to cooperate with authorities. Bank management sought damage control, rather than face up to the criminal activities of the bank's employee, and perhaps the bank itself. The allegations regarding money laundering were treated as an embarrasment to management, rather than as a serious Federal criminal offense.

H.R. 3848 takes an approach aimed directly at this type of management. Besides trying to take the profits out of money laundering, it is designed to take the management out of money laundering financial institutions, and if necessary, to close them down entirely. It holds out the death penalty for financial institution money launderers by threatening to revoke their charter.

Some may think that putting a conservator in place of current management or revoking the charter of a financial institution are harsh measures. After all, money laundering is not a violent crime. No shots are fired. No knives are drawn. But let us never forget, the money that is being laundered is the fruit of human tragedy.

That money was paid to drug dealers by persons addicted to substances that will inevitably kill them. It is money paid by persons who sell their bodies, or in some instances even their children's bodies, to get high on crack or PCP.

Furthermore, the drug dealers themselves do not hesitate to use violence. Here in the Nation's Capital—and its murder capital—80 percent of the murders are drug related. Dealers kill to protect their profits. They hire people to kill for them.

At the root of this slaughter is money. Bank management that allows money laundering to take place, either willfully or through gross negligence, or through a callous disregard for trying to prevent it, forfeits its right to remain in place. H.R. 3848 will enable Federal regulators to remove that management.

Banks are chartered by the Federal Government or the States. Institutions convicted of money laundering, along with high ranking officials, have violated the public trust implicit in their charter. Such a conviction, showing both a corrupt institution and corrupt management, presumptively shows that it has so seriously abused its charter that it should not have one. This legislation will force Federal regulators to hold hearings leading to charter revocation of such corrupt institutions.

Last week, the Justice Department moved to freeze accounts at 173 banks suspected of containing funds belonging to the Medellin drug cartel. This is a step in the right direction. The United States must take the profit out of the drug business, and seizing the profits is the best way to take the profits away. But this can only be accomplished when financial institutions maintain the records that law enforcement needs to track laundered money, and law enforcement agents use that information. This legislation is designed to further both of those goals. Its passage can help make the seizure of drug profits a more frequent occurrence than it is today.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation, which contains other provisions that also strengthen money laundering laws, is a good bill. The chairman of the Full Banking Committee, Mr. GONZALEZ, and the ranking minority member, Mr. WYLIE are both to be congratulated for their hard work on this bill. Both deserve the highest praise for helping get it to the floor so quickly.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the House to pass H.R. 3848.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, the abuse of drugs in today's society is a problem which is painfully obvious and, because drug abuse is so deeply ingrained in the daily lives of so many, there are no easy solutions.

Today, I urge the adoption of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institutions Money Laundering Act of 1990. While it's not a solution to all of society's drug problems, the legislation will continue the success we have made as a nation in combating the illegal activities of those who use our financial institutions to launder the profits of the sale of illegal drugs.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 3848 continues the ongoing work of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs to provide to the law enforcement community the tools they need to apprehend and prosecute money laundering criminals. Before I briefly describe the contents of the bill, I wish to publicly acknowledge the tremendous work of our colleague, FRANK ANNUNZIO, chairman of the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions Supervision, Regulation and Insurance. As original sponsor of H.R. 3848, it is appropriate that we recognize Chairman ANNUNZIO'S significant contributions, not only to this bill, but for his untiring efforts throughout his career fighting drug abuse—making his district and the entire Nation a better and safer place to live.

Let me also extend my appreciation to Hon. CHALMERS WYLIE, ranking member of the Banking Committee's minority, for his cooperation. I want to commend all the members of the Banking Committee, on both sides of the aisle, who worked diligently to bring a comprehensive bill which strengthens our laws against money launderers to the floor of the House of Representatives.

As for merits of the legislation, please keep in mind that the drug trade is a cash business, as much as $100 billion on a yearly basis. A significant amount of this money must ultimately be placed within the financial insitution network if these funds are to be of any use to the drug lords and their agents.

H.R. 3848 represents a important step on the part of the Banking Committee to ensure that money laundering becomes a more detectable and risky undertaking.

The bill requires Federal regulators to conduct hearings on whether to revoke a depository institution's charter whenever the institution and its directors and officers are convicted of money laundering or related offenses.

To eliminate money laundering practices the committee found in hearings conducted in my home State of Texas, H.R. 3848 extends the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, on a targeted basis, to require depository institutions to file copies of their customer's currency transactions reports, so-called CTR's. The bill also expresses the sense of the Congress that the States take a more aggressive role in the licensing and regulation of those cash transmittal businesses that are suspected of being conduits used by money launderers to gain entry into traditional depository institutions.

In the difficult area of monitoring the electronic transfers of funds for potential money laundering purposes, the bill contains language which directs the Secretary of the Treasury to promulgate final regulations requiring recordkeeping of international funds transfers before January 1, 1990.

H.R. 3848 amends the Right to Privacy Act to create a safe harbor from civil litigation for financial institutions who in good faith report suspicious transactions to authorities. The bill will permit State financial institution regulators access to the CRT's collected by the Internal Revenue Service and require the Treasury Department to report to the Congress on the manner which CTR's aid the Federal anti-money laundering effort and report on the way modern technologies may be used in the printing of Federal Reserve notes to make them traceable by electronic scanning devices. Finally, the legislation requires a GAO report on the operation of the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network recently established by the Department of the Treasury as a central data collection and dissemination mechanism for information regarding financial crimes including money laundering.

Mr. Chairman, H.R. 3848 is significant piece of legislation that deserves the support of every Member of the House. This bill was reported by the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs with the affirmative vote of every member of the committee. I urge the same "aye" vote by every Member of the entire House of Representatives.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.)

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the chairman of the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions Supervision, Regulation and Insurance, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], and I would like to associate myself with his remarks, and again compliment him for the hard work that the gentleman has done in helping bring this bill to the House floor today.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990. Money laundering is the lifeblood of any criminal enterprise involving the sale of drugs. I have the feeling that if we could adopt some form of legislation which would stop all money laundering, that we might not stop drug trafficking altogether, but we could certainly reduce the problem very substantially.

H.R. 3848 adds another deterrent for people in financial institutions who might be considering taking in drug money. In some cases where an institution has been convicted of money laundering, that institution could be placed into a conservatorship, effectively zeroing-out any interest in the bank the stockholders might have had, or the institution could have its charter taken away, putting it out of business.

The bill also contains provisions urging the States to start regulating check cashing entities. Many States only license check cashers and don't subject them to regulation. They have been used to launder money especially since our financial institutions have become more vigilant when it comes to suspected money laundering. This provision was included by my colleague JIM SAXTON.

The bill also requires Treasury to come up with regulations on international wire transfers by January 1, 1991. This is an extremely complex area involving over 100 million transactions per year. Efforts to micromanage wire transfers could cost hundreds of millions of dollars and could adversely effect the competitiveness of our financial institutions. The Treasury Department will have the opportunity to fashion regulations that can best target suspected money launderers without burdening the payments system. I support the bill as it stands. Especially because the bill requires the Treasury Department to consult with the Federal Reserve Board when writing these regulations. The Federal Reserve has the most experience in the area of wire transfers; they know what kinds of costs are involved; and, they know how overreaching regulations could affect the payments system.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 3848 in its present form.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES].

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the chairmen of the committees, both the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] for the excellent leadership that they have provided in this important legislation that we are dealing with today.

This country is supposedly engaged in a war on drugs. Money is the lifeblood of drug trafficking. If we are serious about fighting drugs, we need to take the profit out of the drug trade. That is why efforts to combat money laundering are so important.

We spend millions of dollars every year for drug treatment, rehabilitation, and prevention programs. Let us hit the drug lords where it hurts, in their pocketbooks. I will be offering an amendment today that will allow us to stop the drug cartels' use of our banking system for their own gain. Support my amendment on wire transfers if you are serious about fighting the war on drugs.

OPERATION POLAR CAP

The best evidence of the growing sophistication of money launderers came in early 1989, when Federal agents smashed an intricate $1.2 billion scheme based in the jewelry district of the Los Angeles. It laundered money for the Medellin cartel. Wholesale jewelers would receive cash from various cities around the country, count it, bundle it, and deposit it—quite openly—in banks. To make the transactions look legitimate, they created phony receipts showing they were receiving the cash from retail jewelers who were buying gold used in jewelry. In fact, the gold was really bars of lead plated with enough gold to pass a scratch test.

Operation Polar Cap is another example of using the vulnerability of money laundering operations to develop evidence against the underlying drug organizations. It was the largest money laundering investigation ever launched by the Justice Department.

In all, 111 persons have been arrested with seizures including $105.8 million, over 10 tons of marijuana, and one-half ton of cocaine.

There is a civil suit pending to repatriate to the United States over $400 million transferred to foreign banks in the course of the criminal activities.

□ 1320

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BUNNING].

Mr. BUNNING. Mr. Chairman, poor Sam Donaldson and Diane Sawyer.

Sam and Diane took their prime time news team on the road recently to Covington, KY, in my Fourth Congressional District to try and pull off the crime of the century.

What they were looking for was money laundering. What they found were honest banks and sharp employees.

In short, Mr. Chairman, they got busted.

What prime time did was send a news crew with a hidden camera and a briefcase filled with $20 bills to Covington. The news crew went to several banks and savings and loans trying to launder the bills into recently opened checking accounts.

By the time they got to their final bank, the other institutions had already called the police.

The first bank was approached at noon and by 6:00, when they left the last bank, the Covington police swept in and arrested the prime time news crew in a parking lot adjacent to the bank.

The "prime time drug cartel" came to Covington, KY, wanting to look like a scene from "Miami Vice" and ended up looking like a clip from "America's Funniest Home Videos."

In fact, all they got for their efforts was a bill from the city of Covington for $1,021 for the overtime the police spent on the case. I guess crime just does not pay.

Perry Day, president of Kentucky National Bank, one of the banks hit by the "prime time drug cartel," said that his bank had been working diligently to spot the warning signs of money laundering. "This incident just reinforces everything we've told our people," he said in a recent interview.

The point of this story is that the bankers of this Nation do not fall into the same category as those in the drug trade.

The vast majority of bankers are like Perry Day and his employees, outstanding members of their community, bred in honesty, and sincerely concerned about the problems of their towns.

They are the people fighting drugs in their communities.

I am afraid that if this legislation goes beyond what is currently in the bill, we will be confusing the scum in the drug trade with honest bankers. We do not need to add new, unnecessary, burdensome, worthless reporting requirements such as CTR's on wire transfers. Let us pass this bill as it is and keep the banks like those in Covington, KY, actively involved in the war on drugs.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ], who has worked long and hard on this legislation and has contributed so much to the legislation.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time.

Mr. Chairman, I want to return the compliment in kind, because actually the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is the chairman of the subcommittee that has handled this from the very beginning, and he has done an outstanding job, not only in this case but as chairman generally of the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions, which is probably the largest subcommittee in the whole Congress.

I want to say that the bill resulted from a variety of hearings. Most of them were in the subcommittee level. The full committee had hearings in the field, in my hometown of San Antonio, from which we gathered some information that has resulted in one section of this bill with respect to the money changing houses of casas segundos, as they say down in Texas.

So, Mr. Chairman, all in all, as I say, this is a tribute to Chairman ANNUNZIO, and I ought not forget our distinguished ranking minority member, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE], because without his cooperation, we would not have accomplished anything that we have done so far.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SAXTON].

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of this legislation, let me express my appreciation to the chairman of the Financial Institutions Supervision, Regulation and Insurance Subcommittee, Mr. ANNUNZIO and Chairman GONZALEZ for their efforts to swiftly bring this legislation to the floor of the House. Their commitment is indicative of the importance of this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, today we are discussing the drug war. Specifically, the gas in the engine of the drug trafficking machine—money laundering.

In the past, the Congress and the Treasury Department have done an admirable job attempting to police this Nation's banks by requiring stringent reporting regulations for large and suspicious transactions. The legislation before us today will provide us with an additional powerful weapon in this effort to stop money laundering in banks.

But just like cockroaches in the night, these drug peddlers have begun to run from the light focused on the banks—to the darkness of the largely unregulated network of nonbank financial institutions.

Many times, these storefront currency exchanges, check cashing businesses, money transmitters, money order issuers, and other nonbank institutions, exist purely as fronts to launder money. In the absence of adequate oversight, they have become convenient outlets for drug thugs to run their ill-gotten gains through the rinse cycle.

Primarily, the regulatory and enforcement responsibilities in this area have been left to the States. Quite frankly, the States are not doing the job.

It is for this reason that I am pleased that the committee saw fit to include the language of my bill, H.R. 3939 as section 9 of the legislation we have before us.

Simply stated, the goal of my language is to give the States the guidance, opportunity, and frankly, the incentive to draft better licensing and enforcement laws—and enforce them.

The first part of this section is a sense of Congress directive. It calls on the States to adopt uniform licensing and regulation standards for the nonbank financial institutions. A model statute is also provided.

The teeth of the language follows. It calls for recommendations by the Secretary of the Treasury for sanctions or penalties to be imposed to remedy any feet-dragging by the States.

Regulators and agencies such as the Conference of State Bank Supervisors, have testified that these storefront money operations have laundered billions of dollars out of this country. These regulators and supervisors support my language as a logical step to fight this problem.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support the legislation before us. H.R. 3848 and the Saxton language will help to plug the holes in our financial system. It is an important next step in our war on drugs.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me, and I commend the committee for its excellent work in producing this bill today.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3848. Last year I took some time during a recess period to travel to one of our major cities and to spend 3 days with the Drug Enforcement Administration and also other supporting agencies, the FBI, the U.S. Customs, the U.S. Coast Guard, and other agencies that work as a support group in order to try to nail the drug dealers in that city.

One thing that I learned and that surprised me a great deal was the fact that our drug enforcement agents believe that some of the banks in this major city are in the business of promoting the importation of drugs into the United States and the export of the money out of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, it seems that the drug dealers have two basic problems, both dealing with transportation, transporting drugs to the United States and transporting money out of the United States, mostly back to some Latin countries that are prominently involved in the drug trafficking. So, this bill, I believe, will help our enforcement agencies track down and deal with these drug traffickers.

As has been already pointed out, the vast, vast majority of bankers are honest, hard working, solid citizens that support the law and that would not involve themselves in drug trafficking. But unfortunately there are some bankers who are really drug dealers, and they need to be put out of business, and it is the purpose of this bill to put them out of business.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the committee bringing this bill to the floor, and I rise in enthusiastic support of it.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILER].

Mr. HILLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong support of this bill.

H.R. 3848 takes several important steps to combat money laundering and the flow of illegal drugs into our country. The bill hits drug dealers right where it hurts—in their bank accounts. The legislation will give prosecutors and regulators effective tools to continue their battle against drug kingpins.

Most importantly, the bill would give the financial regulators the authority to place an institution into conservatorship, rescind the institution's charter or terminate desposit insurance if the institution is convicted of money laundering. The need for this provision has been demonstrated by the BCCI case where the State of Florida in now attempting to rescind that institution's charter. A legal question exists as whether the State has this power and with this legislation we ensure that the Federal regulators have appropriate authority to deal with institutions involved in criminal activities.

A careful balance has been created in this provision to properly weigh legitimate drug enforcement interests against due process concerns. In the committee's consideration of H.R. 3848, concerns were raised that an innocent institution could be severely penalized for the activities of a lone miscreant employee in an isolated branch. Additional concerns were raised that Congress not create costly, burdensome, new requirements on financial institutions that are superfluous to the war on drugs. For example, testimony before the Banking Committee demonstrated that over 6 million currency transaction reports required by Congress under the Bank Secrecy Act are filed each year and not a single one has ever been used to initiate a prosecution. I believe the committee bill appropriately addresses those concerns and creates tough, new tools to assist prosecutors in their duties. Subcommittee Chairman ANNUNZIO, along with Congressmen MCCOLLUM and CARPER, should be commended for their efforts in crafting a fair compromise. H.R. 3848 creates tough, yet fair new tools in the war against money laundering.

The bill also includes a sense of the Congress resolution, authored by Mr. SAXTON, recommending that States should develop and enact statutes regulating check cashing stores. Check cashing stores have frequently been documented as a source of money laundering activity and this nonbinding resolution seems to be the appropriate first step in properly regulating the activities of these entities.

Finally, I strongly support the provisions of section 10 in the bill dealing with international wire transfers. This is a highly technical area in which Mr. MCCOLLUM and Mr. BARNARD fashioned a suitable compromise that they offered in the Banking Committee and was passed by an overwhelming margin. The McCollum/Barnard amendment requires Treasury to promulgate recordkeeping requirements on international wire transfers prior to January 1, 1991. The Treasury is required to promulgate these rules cooperatively with the Federal Reserve Board and defer to the Board in areas, including the payments system, where the Board's expertise is well established. With the McCollum/Barnard amendment, Congress has made a strong statement concerning international wire transfers, but has not micromanaged the Treasury, nor created specious requirements of little use such as in the case of currency transactions reports. I urge my colleagues to preserve the language of section 10 as it is a tough, but fair compromise.

In closing, let me say that it is my understanding that Treasury, the Federal Reserve Board, and the administration support H.R. 3848 as reported out of the Banking Committee. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this bill and to continue our fight against the money launderers and drug kingpins.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER].

Mr. Chairman, for the record I want to state how hard the gentleman from Delaware has worked on this legislation. He has done a great job, and I appreciate his cooperation in the committee.

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the subcommittee and the full committee for their cooperation and for the opportunity to work with them, and with the Republican members of our committee especially Representative MCCOLLUM, on this important legislation.

It has been said earlier, but I will say it again. People sell drugs to make money, a lot of money. Over $100 billion changed hands on the streets of America during the course of the last year from the sale of drugs. We have attempted to fight the war on drugs on a whole host of fronts. We fight that war in places like Colombia, and Bolivia and Peru, where we tried to go after the drugs at their source. We provide resources to the Coast Guard and Defense Department so that they can interdict the flow of drugs as they come across borders. We provide money for drug education and rehabilitation on the one hand, and for prisons and tough sentences on the other hand for those people who violate our drug laws in this country. Since at least 1970, we also have asked our financial institutions to turn to and to join with us in this fight. For the most part, they have done a good job. For the most part. But we still have money laundered every day, including this day, in cities, large and not so large, throughout this country. Drug dollars are turned into deposits that can be sent anywhere in the world.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation before us today says, "We've got to make it tougher still on would-be launderers." With its adoption, that's exactly what we'll do. If you're a federally chartered institution, or you're an institution that enjoys Federal deposit insurance, if you are convicted of money laundering, with the adoption of this legislation, your regulator has express authority to put a conservator in charge of your institution. If you're a federally chartered institution or a federally insured institution, and you and two or more of your senior officials are also convicted of money laundering, then your regulator must convene hearings to determine whether to revoke your charter and to withdraw Federal insurance from your institution. If you're an individual who works for an institution, and you are convicted of money laundering, you may get out of jail someday, but you will not work in a financial institution in this country ever again. If you're a business or an individual which is currently on an exempt list, not now reported when making large cash deposits, you're going to find it more difficult to get on that list. In addition, we're going to make sure that the law enforcement agencies of this country have access to those lists and look at them closely and carefully to ensure that you are who say you are that your business is legtimate, and that you are not a money launderer. And, finally, if you're now laundering your drug money through a currency exchange house, whether it's on the Texas-Mexican border, or if you are laundering money through a check-cashing house or some other institution which has not been regulated or closely licensed in the past, look out. We're coming after you, too.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation enlists the help of the States, providing State authorities with access to this currency transaction records so they can help us in this fight on drugs.

We also seek to promote bank cooperation with this bill, to enlist more cooperation of financial institutions.

Mr. Chairman, could I have 1 additional minute?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER] has expired.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I do not have the time.

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minority? May I have 1 additional minute from the minority, please?

Mr. WYLIE. I yield the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CARPER] 1 additional minute.

Mr. CARPER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation promotes and asks for further bank cooperation. We protect the banks from suit by their customers suspected of laundering drug money if those institutions are in good faith cooperating with the Federal or State authorities. We do not want them to have to be sued for that cooperation in trying to turn in the money launderers. We insure that the banks have access, a greater voice with the Treasury Department in the formulation of money laundering regulations. Finally, we ask the regulators to share with Congress, and thus with the public, how all the information collected by financial institutions has been used in obtaining money laundering convictions.

On international wire transfers, we are going to move on that front, too, whether it is the Torres amendment, or whether it is with the language in the bill. It is important to move forward, and I think we will.

Finally, let me just say, the punishment for money laundering should fit the crime. No slaps on the wrists, no $100 fines. If people commit drug-related crimes, whether they are selling the drugs on the streets or they're laundering the money through their financial institutions, they should pay for it. They should pay for it dearly by going to jail. They should pay for it with their own money. They should pay for it with their own careers, and in some cases, with the actual closing of financial institutions.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ROTH].

Mr. ROTH. Mr. Chairman, as an original cosponsor of H.R. 4838, the money laundering control bill, I rise in strong support and urge my colleagues to ratify the work we have done in our Banking Committee on this measure.

Money laundering is the hidden side of the international drug cartels, which are pouring $110 billion a year in drugs into our Nation. In communities across the country, the American people can see the social wreckage caused by drugs: crime, broken families, wasted lives and, in all communities a breakdown of the social fabric.

Money laundering is the lifeblood of this deadly and destructive invasion. The proceeds of drug trafficking, mostly in cash, is run through a number of hidden networks to smuggle the funds out of the country and into the legitimate financial system, often reappearing in the United States and other countries as investments and deposits. Money laundering helps spread the cancer of drugs, and if we are to win the war against drugs, then we must attack money laundering with as much vigor as the drugs themselves.

One measure of how widespread this drug cancer has spread as that in my own state of Wisconsin, largely rural and small towns, the Attorney General estimates the drug trade to be $1.2 billion a year, and growing by 20 percent annually. The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration office in Milwaukee has found money laundering trails from Wisconsin leading to hidden accounts in Switzerland and the Cayman Islands, through Miami.

Several months ago, I was given a graphic lesson in how the drug trade works by the Green Bay Police Department antidrug strike force. They detailed for me the drug network bringing the drugs in and moving the money out—so much money in fact that the smugglers don't even count it, they weigh it and estimate its value.

It was that evidence, coupled with the testimony our committee received in Texas last December, which convinced me that tougher laws are needed to give our law enforcement agencies better tools to attack money laundering. Our bill greatly strengthens our attack on illegal drugs. It will, first toughen the penalties on financial executives and institutions which allow themselves to be drawn knowingly into the drug trade; second, broaden the attack to the unregulated check cashing outlets which have become a favorite target of money launderers; and third, arm our law enforcement agencies with new powers to uncover the money laundering networks, through more targeted reporting of suspicious cash transactions.

The bottom line is, any financial institution which is a knowing and willing agent of drug trafficking should be closed down. Both the American people and the rest of our financial system deserve no less protection.

During the committee's deliberations, we adopted careful protections of due process, so that innocent, unwitting parties are not swept up in the law enforcement net. These provisions will ensure that the bankers and other executives—virtually all of whom share our goal of fighting money laundering—will find this bill a positive step in keeping our financial system safe and unencumbered by the drug criminals.

For me, the war on drugs is a top priority. This legislation which we bring to the House today is an important addition to the law, we have written over the past several years to fight illegal drugs. By enacting our bill, we will take a big step toward shutting off the lifeblood of the drug traffickers and saving our country from this scourge of drugs.

I urge my colleagues to vote for our committee's bill.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD].

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, I first want to add my comments and praise to both the chairman of the subcommittee and the chairman of the full committee and the senior minority member for this outstanding bill.

I rise in strong support of the bill as reported by the committee and in strong opposition to the amendment by Mr. TORRES.

The committee has reported out a bill which adequately deals with wire transfers. Under the committee bill, the Treasury must—repeat must—fashion regulations for this rapidly changing area by the January 1, 1991. There is no need for a micromanagement statute which is what Mr. TORRES' amendment ends up being.

Already "Dear Colleague" letters, both for and against this amendment, are floating around which raise grave possibilities for misunderstanding crucial details. Optional inclusion. For instance, one letter talks of the Swift system, which is a communications initiation system and not a clearance/settlement system, as if it was the same as the FEDWIRE which is a payments and settlements system by which we move billions daily. Many members of the committee do have some understanding of these complexities. The committee knew this was not an area for detailed legislating. Consequently, the vote was 32 to 17 to set goals for the Treasury but not intricacies for the 1 trillion dollars-a-day, world-wide, wire transfer sector.

The committee harkened to both the Treasury's and the Federal Reserve's advice not to micromanage in this area—advice which was communicated by note and letter to the committee at the time of markup. Indeed, a misstep here could cost hundreds of millions of dollars, befoul the wire system on which our international banking system depends, and cause wire business to go offshore in huge volumes. All this would be for an erzatz, anti-drug weapons system which gets us very little, if any, bang for the buck.

Indeed, if this were an amendment for an additional hardware weapons system, there is not a fiscally responsible member, conservative or liberal, in this chamber who would not be on his or her feet denouncing it on every conceivable grounds, but most especially for its total lack of redeeming cost benefit.

We all want to stop the druggers. This bill has a lot in it without this needless amendment to do that. I say "needless" because the record keeping systems we even now maintain to curtail druggers are of very, very questionable usefulness. For instance, the currency transaction reporting system, which calls for all kinds of record keeping and reporting, has yet to have anything near a cost benefit for the millions and millions of reports filed each year. That, at least, is what the Drug Enforcement Agency has said in testimony before the other Chamber.

Indeed, by best account, these millions of currency reports end up in an IRS warehouse in Detroit, never to be heard from again.

The millions of currency reports would be dwarfed by what this amendment would set in motion. There are better than 100 million—let me repeat 100 million—international wire transfers annually where a U.S. party is either receiver or sender. The amendment could impose additional costs on each one of them somewhere to the tune of $10 to $15 by Federal Reserve estimate. Even if 75 percent could be exempted from the amendment's requirements, we are talking about $350 million, for something that is terribly cumbersome. Incidentally, I doubt whether the amendment gives the Secretary of the Treasury anything near acceptable exemptive authority to cut this cost even where it is clearly appropriate.

Twenty-two developed countries, including the G-7, just looked at something like this amendment and rejected it as a total misallocation of scarce resources. With the Torres amendment, we are going extraterritorial—again where mostly our allies are concerned—in huge detail—just after they have rejected this approach. For instance, if the Bank of England does not obtain all the Torres-required information, including addresses, from a receiving department of the British Government, that fact would have to be reported to our Secretary of the Treasury by the Bank of England. Multiply that example by certainly many probable, hundreds of thousands of perfectly legitimate transactions, and you have a glimmer of what we are getting into.

My friend and colleague, Mr. TORRES, has indicated it is only a pilot project. That is emphatically not the way I read its text.

By my reading, the Treasury would be, however indirectly, strong armed or, at least, strongly encouraged into certifying after 1 year that all the provisions of the gentleman's amendment—which are very detailed and lengthy on who, what, and where must be recorded—proved useful in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings. After such a certification, the 11 pages of amendments would kick in with the Secretary of the Treasury only being able to make exceptions to their requirements by establishing an amount floor for what has to be recorded.

Once the Secretary had set an amount floor for recordkeeping, he could not exempt any sender or receiver totally from the list of required information although, presumably, he could limit how lengthy he wanted the extent of the records to be on a given, required item.

Moreover, there is some vague, implied duty on each foreign or domestic bank sending or receiving each one of the millions of international wire transactions involved to investigate on the details of a given transaction. This is so because the amendment requires reports to our Secretary of the Treasury on failures by their customers to provide information required by the amendment.

For instance, the sending bank could have to delve into who is the real party in interest that is to receive the wire so as to know truly who it is. Nothing in this amendment says that the information provided by a customer who is sending or receiving a wire is conclusive evidence the banks involved have met their duty.

Indeed, why even have this amendment if the customers we are after, druggers, will do what they most assuredly will do—life. Obviously, the intent of the amendment is to make the banks get beyond the possible lie and report it to our Secretary of the Treasury. Again, looking at the currently running currency transaction system as a proxy for what we can get out of a wire reporting system, it strongly suggests there is no real cost benefit in terms of nailing druggers.

There is not a Member of this Chamber who does not want to shut the druggers down. But I cannot countenance more ineffective action which only makes it look like we are doing something. I am tired of us fooling ourselves with counterproductive remedies like this. To my colleagues on this Democratic side of the aisle, I say, this looks too much like what the drug czar, Mr. Bennett, regrettably does so often—waste a lot of very precious resources for some passing, mythical benefit.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. ROUKEMA].

Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990. And I congratulate the subcommittee and the chairman and ranking Republican for their leadership.

The illegal drug trade in this Nation has become a plague on American society. Everywhere we look, the effects of the drug trade are evident. From the violence associated with drugs which we in this city witness night after night on local television to the dramatic and heart-wrenching problem of crack babies, the experience of a drug infested society is exposed. America is paying the cost in crime, violence, staggering health costs and devastation of communities and whole cities. Truly we must wage total war against drugs.

Police efforts at the local level, while successful in some cases, have had no appreciable effect on the drug trade as the demand and supply far exceeds the local government's ability to provide the necessary resources to combat the problem.

Our criminal justice system has becomed swamped with drug-related cases.

And our foreign policy toward certain nations has become almost totally dominated by the efforts to combat the drug cartels.

This Congress, to its credit, has passed several measures to combat the illegal drug trade. But the effects cannot be fully realized until we get to the heart of the drug trade which is money—money and the huge profits this trade reaps.

Simply stated, the profit in the drug trade is tremendous. And, the one key element in that profitability is the ability to move money from the producer to the seller and back to the producer. Regrettably, the one activity which spurs profit is the ability to use our Nation's financial institutions to launder drug proceeds.

In the omnibus drug bill in 1986, the Congress made money laundering illegal and ordered Federal depository agencies to prescribe regulations which required federally insured banks to monitor compliance with money-laundering requirements. The law also established civil and criminal penalties for profits derived from criminal activities. And in the Omnibus Drug Initiative in 1988, in an effort to lend a Federal hand in the war on drugs, the Congress required banks to report all cash transactions of $10,000 or more; but much more needs to be done.

This legislation, H.R. 3848, creates new penalties to discourage financial institutions from participating in money-laundering schemes.

The measure does the following:

It authorizes the Treasury Department to release to States the information contained in Federal reports on cash transactions to help States investigate money-laundering schemes.

Authorizes Federal banking regulators to appoint a conservator to take over management of an institution convicted of a money-laundering offense.

It requires that management officials of institutions who are convicted of money laundering to be removed from the institution and prohibited from working for any other financial institution in the future.

Establishes a new civil penalty of up to $5,000 per incident to be charged against the institution.

It requires the financial institution to check certain customers and businesses suspected of laundering money.

Finally, and most importantly, it permits the Federal Banking Regulatory and Deposit Insurance Agency to revoke the banks charter or cancel the deposit insurance protection if a bank is found to be continually engaged in money laundering.

Mr. Chairman, this legislation fills additional gaps in war against the drug trade. Will it stop money laundering? Well, as long as there is a demand for drugs and the incentive to make money by trading in drugs, there will be a need to launder money. This bill will go a long way to make laundering more difficult by closely monitoring the activities of our financial institutions and making the penalties stiff for engaging in this criminal activity.

United States financial institutions should be at the forefront of our efforts to combat illegal drug trafficking and money laundering and they should comply with all the laws and regulations relating to money laundering. However, as the inducement to encourage that participation, the provisons of this bill are needed.

This bill enlists financial institutions as active combatants in our all out drug war.

I urge passage of this legislation.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LEVINE].

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank my friend for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from California, my good friend, for offering such an important amendment to this crucial bill. This amendment, although specifically relating to international wire transfers, addresses the very heart of the issue behind controlling the drug war in the United States.

Recently, the Los Angeles City Federal Reserve Bank announced that it has a $3.8 billion cash surplus as a result of huge cash deposits from drug dealers which have been flowing into the city's banks. Records turned over by Panama and eight other foreign governments reveal that drug traffickers are electronically transferring these funds, after having them laundered overseas, back to the United States in order to finance cartel operations here. They are used to pay lawyers, buy aircraft, invest in real estate and other capital-building ventures, and cover general operating expenses.

This amendment will allow the U.S. Government to gain access to a variety of crucial information about the drug running and money laundering operations in this country. If Congress is serious about cracking the drug rings that are wreaking havoc with every level of American society and Government, supporting this amendment is not only a good idea, it is a necessity. I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to stand up to the drug cartels and to let them know Congress is not going to stand by and let them destroy this country. We must give those on the front lines of the drug war the ammunition they need. Please join me in lending your wholehearted support to this important amendment.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to rise in support of H.R. 3848 the Torres amendment to H.R. 3848, and I would like to commend the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] for proposing this amendment, and I would also like to commend the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] the ranking minority member for his efforts in bringing this bill to the floor

Mr. Chairman, for years we have been attempting to address the Atrocities of the drug trade. No other single deterrent would be as effective as cutting out or reducing the profits earned by the sale of illicit narcotics. We all know that the illicit sale of drugs cannot amount to profits for drug kingpins unless the money is laundered.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that strengthening the requirements and increasing penalties is an effective way of attacking the money-laundering link in the chain of drug trafficking. Given the existing State and Federal regulatory powers, and the added provisions of H.R. 3848, money laundering may prove to be the weakest link in the chain of trafficking.

Simply put, the strict penalties which include the revocation of Federal charters and Federal deposit insurance and the prohibition of a convicted money launderer from any affiliation with a financial institution are added discentives for committing this felonious act.

But why must we wait a year before instituting requirements for electronic transfers? The Torres amendment allows us to move forward in the wire transfer area today, requiring institutions to disclose records on international wire services only upon request of the Secretary of the Treasury. Furthermore, this program will act as a pilot program, and after a year the process set forth by the Torres amendment will be assessed.

Mr. Chairman, officials in the field, Federal prosecutors, and Justice Department officials and agents agree that wire transfers are an essential source of information when tracking money launderers. Because of existent computer technology, the information requested in the Torres amendment is readily available. We do not need more time or more proof. The technology already exists, and frankly, we have no more time to waste.

As the drug problem becomes more and more prevasive we must not fail to address it on all fronts, including money laundering. I wholeheartedly support H.R. 3848 with the Torres amendment, and I urge my colleagues to join in my support.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VENTO].

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990. This is an important step in our efforts to combat illegal drug activities in our society. I want to commend the chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], the subcommittee that he chairs, and the ranking member for their work on this matter and for bringing this measure to the House for action.

Frankly, this initiative grew out of the legislative process and the oversight hearings. Congress has long had an interest in dealing effectively with white-collar crime that aids and abets the problems of drugs in our society and in our Nation.

This subject of money laundering has been a subject that the Banking Committee has led in resolving. We are trying to provide the additional tools that may be necessary and hopefully will be used by the Department of Justice and the DEA in pursuing the criminal behavior of drugs and the stream of cash that is the lifeblood, the mother's milk of the drug business in our society.

This legislation already, before it is even passed, has had a positive impact upon the Department of Justice. It is not coincidence that a week ago that the Attorney General has come forward to begin to institute some new policies in the crackdown of drug profits and cash transactions. I think it just demonstrates the Department of Justice's receptivity to the concerns and initiative by Members of Congress who have put forth these new proposals. Members of our committee should be commended and others that have pursued these new initiatives.

There is just no excuse not to provide the legal tools, not to provide the background information that is necessary to, in fact, prosecute the network of drug crime and criminals. So much of the drug-use issue in our society would not exist if we could, in fact, stop the flow of drug dollars.

The implementation of such new laws and policy costs money, but I think we have to balance that off and look at what the impact is, the cost of drugs and the cost of substance abuse in our society. Certainly it is a far greater cost in dollars and human suffering.

The fact of the matter is that drugs are the No. 2 import coming into the United States, largely from South America. Only our oil imports exceed the value of illegal drugs in dollar value as an import, albeit illegal, but they are the No. 2 import.

The magnitude of such commerce doesn't take place in a vacuum; it utilizes the economic system, the financial institutions, and other legal market mechanisms. We must as a policy restrict and stop the misuse of our economic system for such purposes.

During the committee hearings on this legislation, the point was brought home time and time again that the lifeblood, the mother's milk of the drug trade is money. Despite past efforts by Congress to legislatively restrict money laundering, these illegal practices are still the means by which drug assets are funneling drug money within our Nation and around the globe. This bill adds to an already strong legal framework by providing additional authority to the regulators to penalize institutions that violate money laundering rules.

I would like to say that this legislation will be an adequate deterrent and will stop all money laundering. Unfortunately, that is not the case. Clearly, no matter how great a mousetrap we build, some rats will find a way to circumvent detection and prosecution. With this proposed law, the administration will have a better mousetrap, with more tools at their disposal to detect and prosecute violators and to raise the price of breaking the law.

However, to be effective, these proposals, like others, need the enthusiastic support and implementation by the administration. Frankly, I was disappointed by the testimony presented by the administration during the subcommittee hearings on money laundering. During that hearing, it became clear that the administration has not aggressively used the tools available to them. There has been little follow through or monitoring by the regulators and interagency communications are inadequate. As I have pointed out with other issues, Congress can pass good laws and policies, but if those laws are improperly enforced or executed, our efforts will be for naught.

Mr. Chairman, the regulators' lackadaisical attitude and the complaints by some that this bill is too burdensome and costly are misguided. Hopefully, an additional benefit of this legislation is that the regulators and others will finally be convinced that Congress is very serious about drugs and stopping money laundering. Our actions today and continued oversight by the subcommittee will reinforce the message that the drug problem and profits are a phenomena that we must resolve. Clearly, the additional cost and time spent on enforcing measures to stop the flow of drug money are dollars and time well spent, particularly when we see the cost of substance abuse in our society today.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 3848 and then to work to ensure that this measure once law and our previous efforts to stop money laundering are properly enforced.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank my distinguished colleague from Ohio, the ranking Republican on the full committee, for yielding, and I would like to congratulate the chairman of the full committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ], the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES], and I see the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KANJORSKI], and on our side, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SAXTON], the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM], the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD], all of whom have worked very diligently to bring what I believe is a very balanced bill to the floor to deal with a very critical problem.

There is no doubt about the fact that the scourge of drugs and the use of financial intermediaries to launder these illegal profits is something that we are trying desperately to address, and this bill, as it has worked its way through the subcommittee and the full committee, does just that.

Mr. Chairman, the concern that I have is that we may go further than simply addressing the money laundering problem. We may, in fact, dramatically hurt the American consumer, and we do not want to see that happen. Yes, of course, if hurting the American consumer will in some way bring an end to the scourge of drugs and the illegal transfer and laundering of these profits, yes, I think that maybe there should be some pain inflicted on the consumer. But, if we are not going to benefit the consumer and, in fact, hurt the consumer and, at the same time, not do anything to enhance the ability to turn the corner on these illegal profits, obviously it would be a mistake to do that.

This bill as reported out is a very balanced approach to a serious problem. I hope that we do not put into place amendments which could dramatically hurt the American consumer.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOAGLAND], a member of the committee.

Mr. HOAGLAND. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me some time to speak on this very important issue.

Mr. Chairman, I am certainly proud to be associated with this fine legislation and to be associated with the subcommittee and the full committee that produced it.

As others have said before, I do not think this should be misunderstood in terms of our attitude toward banks or bankers. Obviously the vast majority of banks and bankers in this Nation have been very cooperative. Indeed, some of the best tips that we have had that have led to some of the largest seizures in this country have come from banks that have been conscious about money-laundering problems. But the truth of the matter is, and the fact remains, there are about $110 billion a year of cash generated on the streets of this Nation that have to go somewhere, and thousands of dollars of cash in my city of Omaha that are generated every weekend with the drug and gang problem that we have, that has to go somewhere.

What is so good about this bill is that it fleshes out the panoply of actions that the regulators and law enforcement officers can take to deal with this problem.

It allows for the appointment of conservators under certain limited circumstances. It requires revocation of charters. It also enhances the usage of the paperwork procedures, the cash transaction reports that people are now required to fill out when they deal with $10,000 or more. It also enables banks to require the production of cash transaction reports from heavy cash customers that come in with a lot of cash into the banking doors to be sure that those Internal Revenue Service forms have been properly completed.

Let me just simply say to the chairmen of the subcommittee and the full committee, I want to congratulate them for their efforts in making sure that those few who do violate the law are going to pay the price, that law enforcement and regulators have those tools to make sure that appropriate measures will be taken. I want to thank both Members for their work on this effort.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chaiman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM], a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and one who has a very strong interest in this bill.

Mr. MCCOLLUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in very strong support of this legislation. It is a further step in our efforts in the war on drugs to try to win against the money launderers, against the big drug kingpins, who push millions and millions of dollars through our banking system every year. Actually they push probably millions through every day, whether we know it or not.

This bill does provide some new tools. As has been said, it provides the opportunity when a bank or financial institution of any type has been convicted of money laundering, when the institution itself has been convicted, it provides the opportunity and permission to the regulators to appoint a conservator and to basically take that institution away from the people who have been managing it.

Second, when you have in addition to an institution being convicted two or more officers or directors, key officers or directors, you have the opportunity, and in fact you have the requirement for a hearing and the potential for a revocation of charter.

In addition, there is a provision in this that I am very proud of that I helped author with the gentleman from Georgia that would require the Treasury to promulgate regulations within a very short period of time on international wire transfers, requiring in certain instances under those regulations that those wire transfer transactions be reported, just as currency transactions are today. But it does not require that they be done in every instance and it does not require any trigger later on for all institutions to be covered. It gives a very fine tuning to what is the power of the Treasury in its own discretion to decide when, where, and how.

Reluctantly, I must oppose an amendment to be offered later by the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES], which I think goes far beyond what is needed and will present onerous burdens to the banking community if we allow it to become part of this bill. We do not need it, it is not necessary. Law enforcement opposes it. Quite frankly, I think that what we need today is in this legislation already, which is a provision that gives the Treasury power on a case-by-case, circumstance-by-circumstance basis, to designate when and where and how it wants wire transfers, transactions, reports made, for our law enforcement agencies, rather than burdening them with any specific requirements beyond that.

With that in mind and in full support of this legislation, I yield back to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] any remaining time I may have.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKLE].

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Chairman, we will lose the war on drugs unless effective measures are in place to shut down money laundering operations. The Department of the Treasury recently stated that worldwide illegal drug revenues exceed $300 billion yearly, including about $110 billion that are generated in this country. The drug trade is primarily cash business and the exchange of currency on the streets of our cities and towns which is later laundered through our banks and other businesses continues to grow despite Government's enforcement efforts.

H.R. 3848 is a strong package of anti-money-laundering provisions which will give the Government additional means to apprehend those who use our financial institutions as a tool to hide and convert drug money into traditional financial assets. Additional weapons are often needed to keep pace with the sophisticated means money launderers employ to avoid detection and prosecution.

The Subcommittee on Oversight of the Committee on Ways and Means has also played an important role in combating money laundering. Several years ago, I testified before the Banking Committee in support of pending legislation to crack down on money laundering "smurfs," and to facilitate the seizure and forfeiture of assets purchased with laundered cash. Provisions in both titles 31 and 26 of the United States Code were reformed at that time.

Currently, the Subcommittee on Oversight is now investigating the extent to which the business community is not complying with section 6050I of the Internal Revenue Code which was added by the 1984 Tax Act. Under this law, cash transactions involving the purchase of services or goods, such as cars, boats, furs, jewelry, real estate, collectibles, and other items, of over $10,000 must be reported to the Internal Revenue Service. Our preliminary investigation shows that there are serious compliance and administrative problems with this cash reporting law.

Money launderers are notorious for devising new and ingenious ways to disguise their cash. The subcommittee has found that drug dealers are increasingly spending their drugs proceeds on luxury items such as cars, boats, and houses. Many businesses which profit from these cash sales are ignoring their reporting responsibilities. At the conclusion of our investigation, the Subcommittee on Oversight will hold hearings to present its findings and recommendations for improved compliance.

Mr. Chairman, I insert a copy of committee Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI's letter concerning the reporting requirement in H.R. 3848 on form 8300—(report of cash payments over $10,000 received in a trade or business)—under Internal Revenue Code section 6050I.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, April 19, 1990.

Hon. HENRY B. GONZALEZ,
Chairman, Committee on Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs, House of Representatives, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter is in reference to Section 15 of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990. I am sure that we all support any and all efforts which contribute to our Nation's war on drugs.

Section 15 of H.R. 3848 requires a report to Congress from the Secretary of the Treasury, concerning reports filed under, and in compliance with, Section 6050I of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986. While I will not object to the inclusion of this reporting requirement in the bill, I must point out that Code Section 6050I is a matter which is solely within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Ways and Means, having been enacted in 1984 in an effort to increase income tax compliance. In addition, these reporting requirements continue to be of interest to Members of my committee. In fact, the Subcommittee on Oversight of the Committee on Ways and Means is currently investigating compliance with Section 6050I.

The Committee on Ways and Means will gladly work with your Committee in this particular area. However, I'm sure you will appreciate the need to respect the separate jurisdictional responsibilities of our two committees, as well as the fact that the inclusion of Section 15 in H.R. 4848 does not alter those jurisdictional responsibilities.

Sincerely,

DAN ROSTENKOWSKI,
Chairman.

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. AKAKA].

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990, and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, let me begin by commending the Banking Committee, particularly the gentlemen from Illinois and Texas, the chairmen of the Financial Institutions Subcommittee, Mr. ANNUNZIO, and full Banking Committee, Mr. GONZALEZ, respectively, for their fine work in bringing this legislation before the House today.

H.R. 3848 is a timely and comprehensive bill which will assist the Treasury in its efforts to discourage the practice of money laundering. This bill creates tough new penalties to discourage participation by financial institutions in the conversion of ill-gotten drug profits into legitimate assets, without imposing burdensome requirements or costs upon institutions or their customers.

Congress has enacted amendments discouraging money laundering practices as part of omnibus drug legislation in 1986 and 1988. H.R. 3848 improves upon current law by authorizing the release of information from cash transaction reports and customs monetary instrument reports to State financial institution regulatory agencies. It also creates tough, new penalties to discourage financial institution participation in laundering schemes. The bill permits Federal regulators to appoint a conservator, revoke the charter, or end the deposit insurance of any federally chartered or insured institution convicted of money laundering activities.

I am a staunch advocate of an aggressive national policy to stem the flow of drugs into our country. Money is the Achilles heel of the drug trade. Every step must be taken to stop the conversion to legitimate use of the estimated $110 billion a year generated in street transactions.

As a member of the Appropriations Treasury-Postal Service Subcommittee, I can attest that every Federal agency involved in drug interdiction that comes before our committee, including Treasury, the Customs Service, and IRS, points to tough money laundering provisions as essential to the efforts of law enforcement officers to deny drug dealers the use of profits derived from the misery and suffering they cause. H.R. 3848 provides the mechanism necessary to facilitate the detection, apprehension, and prosecution of money launderers. This is a good, tough, and fair bill.

I thank the distinguished chairman for this time, and urge my colleagues to support the bill.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KANJORSKI].

Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Chairman, as one of 13 original cosponsors of H.R. 3848, the Money Laundering Amendments of 1990, I am proud to join Chairman ANNUNZIO, the original author of the legislation, in bringing this bill to the floor.

Mr. Chairman, the legislation we consider today is the result of extensive hearings held both by subcommittee Chairman ANNUNZIO, and full committee Chairman GONZALEZ, and careful deliberation and compromise in committee. The committee's unanimous 49 to 0 rollcall vote in favor of the bill is an indication of the widespread, bipartisan support it enjoys.

Many members of the committee contributed to the final product we are considering today, but I would be remiss if I did not acknowledge the contributions of Chairman ANNUNZIO, who identified this problem early on and is the driving force behind our effort to put the money launderers out of business; Chairman GONZALEZ who has also delved extensively into this topic and introduced his own legislation; the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] who has highlighted the role of wire transfers in the money laundering process and who has consistently prodded the Treasury to be more aggressive in its oversight of the wire transfer system; and the gentlemen from Delaware and Florida, Mr. CARPER and Mr. MCCOLLUM, who helped put together the consensus committee bill.

Mr. Chairman, money is the motivating force behind the illegal narcotics industry. Drug producers, smugglers, and sellers would be out of business tomorrow if they could not find a way to disguise the proceeds of their ill-gotten gains.

Money launderers are as guilty of destroying our Nation's youth as the growers and the traffickers. Although they may wear white collars and wingtips instead of blue collars and designer sneakers, they are an integral part of the drug cartel.

Every year money laundering contributes to the addiction of millions of our citizens and the death of thousands.

That is why our bill proposes a capital penalty for this ultimate of capital offenses.

Under our bill, Federal regulators will be able to impose the financial equivalent of the death penalty on institutions which are convicted of money laundering.

This is a strong penalty, but it is the only way we can effectively deter a few greedy institutions from being lured into the money laundering business by the large profits which can be made. Officers, directors, and shareholders need to know that there is a penalty to be paid if they allow their institutions to be used by the drug cartels.

In addition, our legislation also ensures that anyone who is affiliated with a financial institution who is convicted of money laundering will be barred for life for ever working for another financial institution. This gives meaning to the old adage, "Fool me once, shame on you. Fool me twice, shame on me." Our bill will deprive money launderers of a second chance to ply their illegal and destructive craft.

Finally, our bill increases civil money penalties which can be imposed on institutions which fail to comply with the requirements of the Bank Secrecy Act; it requires the Treasury to issue regulations tightening disclosure on international wire transfers by January 1, 1990; it authorizes the Treasury to tighten up the currency transaction report process; and encourages the States to license and regulate noninsured check cashing services and money exchange houses.

This is a good bill which gives the Justice Department, the Treasury, and the financial regulators the tools they need to take action against money launderers, without unfairly burdening the vast majority of financial institutions which operate honestly and properly. It deserves the support of every Member.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, first I rise in strong support of H.R. 3848, and I want to compliment the chairman of the subcommittee and the chairman of our full committee, and everyone else who did so much good work on this bill. We all know that illegal drugs are a plague on America, they destroy our children, they condemn our cities, and to end this scourge we have indeed declared a war on drugs.

But until we take the profit out of drugs, the plague will continue to spread, the war will continue. The drug business is at bottom a money business. If we can make it harder for drug dealers to turn their illegal profits into clean money, we can begin to win this war.

I know some of the bankers say it is not their fault; all money is green. But in this new world we need more responsibility, not just from bankers but from all people in our communities. We tell bartenders who give someone their 10th or 11th drink that they may well be responsible for death from drunk driving that comes from that, and we must tell bankers the same, that they are responsbile as well for their actions. We are dealing with all sorts of business institutions in our society, and even though they are not directly to blame, if they aid and abet those who are, the profiteers, we are telling them they will be held somewhat responsible.

We have no choice in our society. That is the bottom line. If everyone just looked after their own interest, not only would drugs and all of these other problems overwhelm us, but it would be a society where each individual would be off on his or her own.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, that this bill will go a long way to getting tough with money launderers. It will aid in our war on drugs.

There will be an amendment which I believe is appropriate and will toughen things, but this is a great start, and I would like to once again urge all of my colleagues, if they are serious about the war on drugs then vote for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself my remaining time.

Mr. Chairman, the Treasury, the Federal Reserve, and the banking industry all support H.R. 3848 as reported. But they are opposed to any amendments to the legislation which would further specify recordkeeping requirements on electronic wire transfers.

May I say that bankers are to be complimented for Operation Polar Cap which was announced on March 29, 1989, as the largest money laundering investigation ever to be conducted. Officials at the Department of Justice, the IRS, and Treasury have publicly stated that if it were not for alert bank officials who tipped off the Government on suspicious operations, there would not have been an Operation Polar Cap. Records compiled by banks under current law aided in Operation Polar Cap, and I do not believe that there is any need for additional recordkeeping at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the bill in its present form.

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Chairman, today, through passage of H.R. 3848, the Money Laundering Prevention Act, we have an opportunity to give a strong boost to the fight against drug traffickers by hitting them at the point in which it will hurt them most—in their profits and in their pockets. H.R. 3848 creates new penalties to discourage financial institutions from participating in money laundering activities.

The fight against illegal drugs requires everyone working together. In order to profit from the illegal drug business, drug traffickers must have a way to move their cash into the legal currency system. This action frequently involves financial institutions. While many of our Nation's banks have made real efforts to assist in the fight against money laundering, and I commend them for their efforts, more needs to be done.

The Torres amendment would require the Treasury Department to establish a pilot program of recordkeeping for international electronic transfers of funds that would require customers to supply to banks the names, addresses, and account numbers parties involved in the transaction. These records would be reported to the Secretary of the Treasury only upon request; there is no mandated reporting requirement. It would be also up to the Secretary of the Treasury to establish the wire transfer dollar amount which would trigger the recordkeeping requirement.

The provisions of the Torres amendment will be useful to law enforcement in tracing the complex trail of drug money. We must give law enforcement the tools necessary to identify and prosecute drug traffickers. The more information available to law enforcement, the more effectively they will be able to do their job.

The Torres amendment wisely establishes a pilot program to assess the effectiveness of the process and its impact on international commerce before the program is implemented nationwide. This amendment seeks to assist our law enforcement officials in their efforts against drug traffickers. I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990, a bill I was pleased to cosponsor with the chairman of the Financial Institutions Subcommittee, Mr. ANNUNZIO.

For those who doubt the critical role the banking system can play in the drug trade, the actions taken last week by the Federal Government should be an education.

The Justice Department, based on a review of bank records seized after the invasion of Panama, obtained a court order to freeze hundreds of accounts in this country, an action which affected 173 banks. According to press accounts, $1 billion of drug profits were removed from the United States from 1987 to 1989. Approximately $350 million was transferred abroad and, incredibly, returned to the United States banks to finance the activities of the Medellin drug cartel.

To combat the drug cartels at this level, we need to give enforcement officials the necessary tools. That is the purpose of the deposition institution money laundering amendments.

This legislation, which was approved unanimously by the House Banking Committee, allows Federal banking legislators to appoint for any federally chartered or federally insured depository institution when such institution is convicted of money laundering offenses.

In addition, whenever two or more members of senior management of an institution are convicted of money laundering offenses, Federal regulators are required to hold a hearing to determine whether the Federal charter or, in certain instances, Federal deposit insurance, should be revoked.

This amounts to the imposition of an institutional death penalty for those banks, thrifts, or credit unions which choose to engage in money laundering, or who fail to control senior level employees.

The bill also makes several key reforms in cash transaction reports.

The Bank Secrecy Act of 1970 requires financial institutions to report cash transactions of $10,000 or more to the Internal Revenue Service. Since the drug business is a cash and carry operation, such reports are very useful in following a money trail. In the 100th Congress, the Omnibus Drug Act (Public Law 960) allowed the Treasury Department to maintain additional cash transaction records in certain areas, if necessary.

This legislation further strengthens the cash transaction requirements by allowing the release by Treasury to state financial regulatory agencies the information contained in the reports. This will assist local antidrug efforts.

In addition, the bill mandates that financial institutions require private check cashing businesses, which play an increasingly important role in money laundering, also file with the federally insured institution the cash transaction reports which the check cashing business is supposed to file with the Treasury Department. If the check cashing business does not file these reports, the insured institution would report this fact to the IRS. The legislation also expresses the sense of the Congress that States establish uniform laws to regulate check cashing businesses.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in strong support of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendments of 1990. I commend Congressman HENRY GONZALEZ, the chairman of the House Banking Committee, Congressman FRANK ANNUNZIO, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Financial Institutions, and the other members of the Banking Committee for their legislative efforts which have resulted in bringing this bill before us for a vote in the House of Representatives today.

Money laundering is the fuel which runs the engine of the drug trade. The Select Committee on Narcotics, which I chair, estimates that the drug trade generates $150 billion annually in the United States alone. Worldwide the money generated by the narcotics trade may be as high as $300 billion annually.

The Congress passed landmark legislation to combat drug trafficking in 1986 and 1988. These laws toughened criminal penalties for various drug trafficking offenses, provided additional resources for Federal, State, and local law enforcement agencies, provided additional money for international narcotics control, expanded drug abuse education programs, and provided money to improve drug treatment and rehabilitation programs. Last year, Congress added nearly $1 billion in additional anti-drug funds to the amounts requested by President Bush in his September 1989 national drug control strategy.

However, Mr. Chairman, all of these laudable efforts, while they are important and have had a positive effect, have not cured the epidemic of drug abuse in America. Law enforcement officials have, however, become smarter in fighting drug traffickers. They have discovered that one of the most effective law enforcement techniques in slowing down drug trafficking is to follow the flow of the money.

The Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986 created the offense of money laundering in Federal law and closed loopholes in then existing currency laws to prevent the evasion of currency reporting requirements. The Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 provided that no financial institution may issue or sell a bank check, cashier's check, traveler's check, or money order to any individual in amounts of $3,000 or more, unless that person has an account with the financial institution or can furnish verifiable forms of identification.

The 1988 act gave the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary authority to target a domestic financial institution or group of financial institutions located in any specified geographic location where drug trafficking and/or money laundering are prevalent to obtain, retain, and report additional cash transactions information. It provided for a maximum $10,000 per day penalty for willful or grossly negligent violation of recordkeeping regulations by any insured banks, other financial institutions, or by an employer, director, or officer.

H.R. 3848 builds upon the improvements in fighting money laundering made possible by passage of the Anti-Drug Abuse Acts of 1986 and 1988. Specifically, it provides that the appropriate Federal regulator may appoint a conservator for any federally chartered or insured financial institution convicted of money laundering after considering the extent to which senior management was involved in the offense, whether the institution had policies and procedures to prevent money laundering, the degree to which the institution has cooperated with law enforcement authorities, and whether the institution has implemented new procedures to prevent the occurrence of similar money laundering crimes in the future. In the case of State chartered banks the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation shall notify the appropriate State regulator 10 days before the conservator shall be appointed to give the State an opportunity to appoint a conservator under State law.

The bill also provides that the appropriate Federal regulator must hold a hearing to consider revoking the charter of any federally insured or chartered financial institution, or in the case of State institutions to terminate Federal deposit insurance, whenever an institution and directors or officers of the institution are convicted of money laundering.

The bill also includes provisions to insure compliance with cash transaction reporting requirements by currently unlicensed and unregulated cash-based businesses, such as check cashing businesses, currency exchanges and the like which are frequently used to launder illicit drug profits.

Another section in the bill provides that any person convicted of money laundering or of structuring transactions to evade reporting requirements who is affiliated with a financial institution shall be removed from the institution and barred from affiliating with financial institutions in the future. Section 7 of the bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may impose civil money penalties of not more than $5,000 where the financial institution engages in a pattern or practice of negligent conduct which violates the Bank Secrecy Act, and regulations. Under current law, the Secretary may only impose fines up to $500 for negligent violations of the act.

The bill expresses the sense of Congress that States should license and regulate nondepository institutions that cash checks, transmit money, or issue or redeem money orders or travelers checks. Mr. Speaker, an important part of the bill is section 10 which concerns international wire transfers. It provides that before January 1, 1991, the Secretary of the Treasury must establish in final form the regulations necessary to ensure that insured depository institutions maintain such records of international fund transfers as will have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory proceedings.

Other provisions in the bill would amend the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to allow him to require that financial institutions keep targeting orders confidential, give State financial institution regulators access to the currency transaction reports maintained by the Treasury, and provide for a study of the methods and technologies that may be used in the printing of Federal reserve notes to make such notes traceable by an electronic scanning device.

H.R. 3848 will significantly increase the capabilities of Federal and State bank regulatory agencies and law enforcement agencies to conduct money laundering investigations successfully. I am pleased to support this bill.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FOGLIETTA

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FOGLIETTA: Page 43, after line 17, insert the following new subparagraph (and redesignate the subsequent subparagraph accordingly):

(B) as a condition for the issuance and continued validity of the license—

(i) the business may not impose, charge, or collect any fee for cashing or redeeming any travelers' check, check, money order or similar instrument in excess of the amount which is equal to the greater of—

(I) an amount equal to 1.5 percent of the face amount of such check or money order (not to exceed $8); or

(II) 50 cents; and

(ii) the business shall post in a conspicuous place a schedule, in English and Spanish, of all fees and charges for cashing or redeeming any travelers' check, check, money order, or similar instrument (including the maximum charges established pursuant to clause (ii)); and

Page 43, line 17, strike "and".

Mr. FOGLIETTA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, our Nation is under siege by drug lords and dealers. Sadly, a few corrupt bankers work hand in glove with these people.

For a few bucks, they're willing to compromise the honest reputation of their fellow bankers. More importantly, they are sacrificing an entire generation of American youth.

I am heartened that we in Congress are acting to curtail this national and international outrage.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to direct our attention to a lesser known financial institution—the check cashing agency. These businesses, for a fee, will cash your check.

Many Americans—our senior citizens, the poor, other underprivileged consumers—are unable to afford bank accounts, or are just suspicious of banks. Consequently, they are forced to use these check cashing agencies. And for this, they pay dearly. Check cashing agency fees are often outrageous.

In most States, check cashing fees are not subject to State laws. And the Federal Government doesn't regulate them at all. That means when our senior citizens cash their monthly Social Security checks, these agencies can charge any rate they desire.

I know of one horror story where Bradley Matthews, a disabled man from North Philadelphia, was charged $800 to cash a $6,900 Social Security check—that's almost 12 percent of the check's value. Mr. Matthews was 6 months late on his rent. He needed money desperately. That was too much for him to have to pay to cash a check.

My amendment urges States to toughen the standards by which check cashing agencies would receive a State license to operate. It calls for limits on how much a check cashing agency may charge to cash a check.

Specifically, no more than 1.5 percent of the check's value or $8, whichever is less. And, it requires these businesses to display a schedule of fees in both English and Spanish.

While the section of the bill it amends is a nonbinding sense of Congress, I believe it sends a clear message to the States: let's regulate these check cashing agencies. It's time to stop them from robbing our senior citizens and poor consumers who have nowhere else to go.

Mr. Chairman, my purpose in proposing this amendment is quite simple. Check cashing agencies provide an important service to millions of Americans. A few of these businesses, however, take unfair advantage of their customers, charging outrageous fees, ripping-off our constituents—and it is all perfectly legal.

The corrupt check cashing agencies, which rip off our senior citizens and prey on the poor, are the same type of people who launder money for the drug dealers. By passing strong legislation today—urging tough State laws on check cashing agencies—we will help put drug money launderers out of business.

I urge you to adopt my amendment and strengthen this model statute to finally govern these check cashing agencies.

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOGLIETTA. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Chairman, it is my understanding that this amendment leaves intact the original intent of the language that was added as a result of my amendment in the subcommittee, and further, and in terms of its intent, by adding additional language which caps the amount that can be charged by check cashers; that is, nonbanking institutional check cashers to cash checks.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. That is correct.

Mr. SAXTON. If that is the case, Mr. Chairman, and I believe it has been verified by the ranking member and his staff on this side that that is the case, then I have no objection, and I commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania for going this extra step.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. I thank the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize the purposes of the author of this amendment, and I commend him for some of the reasons behind it. But I would submit that this amendment really does noting to enhance the purposes of this bill, which is a good bill. In fact, I think it degrades the purposes of this bill.

Indeed, if we need to do something of this sort about the check cashing business, it should be a bill of its own, or perhaps another kind of legislation that is addressing the structure of the financial industry, not in this bill dealing with drug laundering.

I do not rise in defense of the check cashing business. I recognize there are many horror stories that can be cited about the way transactions are conducted in that business. But I do not think this amendment is the proper way to get at some of those horror stories. To me it represents a very blatant intrusion of the Federal Government into the free market system. It tells this particular business that we are going to tell them how much they can charge for a service.

Granted, we tell them what the cap, the maximum will be, but certainly within that we are telling them what their services are worth, and how much they can charge for them. I would suggest that in the prices charged by these businesses, if they are allowed to respond to the forces of the free market, they will reflect the costs of doing business without causing unnecessary costs for their customers.

The thing that really bothers me about the amendment, though, is a provision in subparagraph 2 which says that these businesses shall post in a conspicuous place a schedule in English and in Spanish of all fees, charges and so forth.

Mr. Chairman, if we embark upon this course, we actually are embarking upon an errand which eventually will lead to a bilingual society in America. Is this what we want? Should the Government be mandating these announcements be available in more than the English language? And, if so, why Spanish? Why not Chinese? Why not Cambodian? Why not Tagalog? There are a number of other languages that perhaps we could think of that would serve some useful purpose.

I just say we should not be moving into arenas like this without full legislative understanding, without a much more deliberate purpose, without a much more suitable vehicle for amendments like this to apply to.

Finally I would just say, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me if we adopt this amendment we are possibly going to reduce the availability of the check cashing services to those who need them, because these restrictions I think will make the business unprofitable for many and therefore could actually work in a direction that would be very harmful to consumers.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUMWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from California for his statement.

I think we have to recognize that any time that you artificially try to, by legislative fiat, limit and lower the price of a commodity, you will probably increase the demand and reduce the supply. It just happens every time. There is no difference on check cashing.

I do not believe that we in this body can say what is the cost that should be imposed on cashing a check in every check cashing facility across 50 States. It just does not make any sense at all.

There have been many surveys done of check cashing outlets. The fact is that people go to check cashing outlets because quite often they like the service, quite often they already have other types of banking relationshps but they like to be able to go to a check cashing house. They like the hours. Quite often they are open longer than banks are. Quite often they are on the way home or to the subway station. There are a lot of reasons why they use it.

To try to artificially reduce the price of them as opposed to regulating them, as Mr. SAXTON wants to do, which I think is a suitable amendment—and I spoke to it in my opening remarks on the bill—if we try to artificially reduce the price, we will either restrict the number of checks that are cashed or will put check cashing businesses out of business. Then those consumers who are using them, instead of having to pay $2 or $3 or $5 to cash will now only have to pay $1.50 but they will not be able to cash the check. So I just want to rise in support of the gentleman's statement and hope my colleagues oppose this amendment.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUMWAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent the gentleman be allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 30 seconds remaining.

Mr. DREIER of California. I saw the gavel in midair and thought that his time was up.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman continue to yield?

Mr. SHUMWAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DREIER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to join in opposition to the amendment. I am not going to stand here as the gentleman has said, as an apologist for the check cashing business. We know there are some major cases of problems which have come about. My friend from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] was just telling me about some instances which have been reported.

There are problems in this area. But at the same time, how far are we going to go in turning the financial services industry into a public utility?

It seems to me this is just one more step on the road toward tampering with that free market process, and I hope very much that we will reject the amendment, as well-intentioned as it is.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOGLIETTA] has pointed out in his "Dear Colleague" to the case of $900 being charged to a woman who had a check for $3,200 or $3,300 for social security.

Obviously that is horrible. But I do not believe that having the Federal Government mandate all the way across the country, as my friend from Indiana said—I suspect that rents are a little different in South Bend than they are in Los Angeles. Obviously for us to federally mandate a certain cap would dramatically skew the rates all across the country.

I think it is a real mistake even though I do have high regard for the gentleman and I hope very much the House will reject the amendment.

Mr. SHUMWAY. I thank the gentleman for that timely comment.

Mr. Chairman, I also have high regard for the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I know his motive is good. I understand the purpose behind the amendment. But I do think that given the thoughts which have been expressed in the last few minutes we should recognize that it perhaps belongs in a different bill, debated in a different context and maybe not made as a very serious intrusion, I think, into the free market system.

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I just want the record to reflect that not everyone on this side of the aisle feels the same. I strongly support the language added to my amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Just to remark about some of the objections which have been made: The intrusion into the industry is kind of an amusing thing to me because we regulate people, we legislate people whenever there is a need, whenever it happens to be someone who in our perception, in our opinion, is being taken advantage of. We pass a law to stop those infringements upon individual liberties and individual rights that people have. When someone is taken advantage of, that is why we are here.

I would suggest that in this case, in the case of the older folks who have social security checks to cash, in the case of people who are perhaps not as well off who use the check casher, that there is a need, as the gentleman from Philadelphia suggests, for this type of legislation.

Second, I would suggest that the use of two languages is not new in our society. As a matter of fact, some voting ballots that I have seen had English and Spanish on them. What is wrong about that? I have seen trains where escape hatches and windows that are pushed out have directions written in English and in Spanish. I have seen the same on airplanes.

So this is certainly not breaking any new ground or cracking any new ice. This is something that is done on an ongoing basis.

I would point out further that I am not sure, but I interpreted some of the comments as indicating that we were regulating the banking industry. That is simply not true. This language goes to regulate nonbanking institutions, basically check cashers.

Near the bank that I bank at, when you pull out of the parking lot, there is a building right across the street that says "Get your checks cashed here." Those are the folks that the gentleman is suggesting we ought to regulate.

So, Mr. Chairman, without carrying this any further, I think that the gentleman's amendment is a good amendment and there is a significant amount of support on this side of the aisle for it.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAXTON. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman mentioned that we routinely regulate services, products, et cetera, when someone is being abused. I would say it is not very frequent that at the Federal level we regulate prices that people can charge.

Let us go back about 3 years or so ago when we were debating a measure on the floor of the House concerning interest rate caps on credit cards. At that time the House voted overwhelmingly to reject the notion that we ought to regulate the interest rate that could be charged on a credit card. What we did instead was to say that there ought to be a maximum amount of disclosure, there ought to be clearly defined and easy-to-understand requirements when someone has a credit card, but we stopped short of saying that we ought to regulate the price. That is up to the consumer.

As I understand the gentleman from New Jersey's provision in the bill, what he seeks to do is to have the type of regulation in which it is going to make sure that when the consumer walks in to have a check cashed, it is being done consistent with good business practice.

However, the gentleman stopped short in his original provision of saying what the price should be.

It seems to me there are some analogies here between what the gentleman from Pennsylvania does in the well-meaning amendment from what the attempt was in the credit card interest rate cap area.

I am just not sure there is a place for it in the type of market system that we have.

Mr. SAXTON. Reclaiming my time, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana and I were on the same side of the argument on the limit of interest rates. I am glad we were.

The reason we ended up on the same side of the argument was that at the outset of that debate, which lasted for several months as I recall, as people came to us to explain the situation to us, I was convinced that the gentleman was, as most members of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs were, that there was justification for the amount of rates, for the rates of interest that were charged with regard to the credit card industry.

So that may have been one instance where the gentleman and I agreed, and in this instance I am not sure I can agree that the rates that are charged, such as the gentleman pointed out, $800 or $900 fee for cashing a check is obviously something I do not think is justified.

Mr. HILER. If the gentleman will continue to yield, let me say at this point, the gentleman is certainly right. Someone who charges $800 or $900 for a $3,200 check, is not right. It is not correct. It is wrong. I certainly would not in any way want to defend that type of practice.

We had hearings in the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage last year. We had check cashers come before our subcommittee.

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, we had hearings on the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage, and we had check cashers come before the members, and we saw the results of studies that had been done. Clearly, what the gentleman from New Jersey seeks to do, I think, is a legitimate effort, but based on the testimony that we had in the subcommittee, and based on the studies that we have seen, I just would have to, once again, say that regulating the price here on the floor of the Congress today would not be a good action to take. While it may correct the abuse of the person having to pay $800, but there are a lot of people that use check cashers that will not be able to get a check cashed.

Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I thought we were going to be considering legislation today that was designed to deal with the tragic problem of the money laundering of drug moneys. It is clear to me that this amendment has nothing whatsoever to do with the issue that we are trying to address here. As my friend from Indiana [Mr. HILER] said, the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage has been going through the hearing process, dealing with the issue of check cashing, and now here in this bill in which we are trying to deal with the scourge of money used for drug trafficking, we are bringing up an amendment which I believe has no relation whatsoever with what we are trying to address.

I think that clearly is one more reason that we should be opposed to this amendment.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOGLIETTA].

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, first of all let me say to the gentleman who preceded me who asked the question about the intent of the legislation, most of these check cashing agencies also sell money orders, in addition to cashing checks. It is a common practice for those involved in illegal activities to bring the cash to the check cashing agency, get a money order from the check cashing agency, and then deposit it in their checking accounts. Therefore, we have nefarious activities on the part of the check cashing agents, which do affect the legislation before Members.

Second, let me say this legislation which we are passing is a model legislation which is a suggestion to the States, and not binding upon any State in the Nation.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I simply would like to ask on the issue that the gentleman just raised, how does imposing a cap on the cost relative to cashing of checks in any way prevent people from utilizing the money order and the cash transfer we have discussed?

Mr. FOGLIETTA. First of all, the people, many of the people who are engaged in this activity, are engaged also in the business of money laundering, and this is what will put them out of the business of check cashing, and also we hope will put them out of the money laundering business.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I move the previous question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would advise the gentleman from Illinois that that motion is not in order in the Committee of the Whole.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SHUMWAY TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FOGLIETTA

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SHUMWAY to the amendment offered by Mr. FOGLIETTA: Strike lines 12 through 17.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is very simple, obviously, but it addressed the bilingual requirement that I spoke of a few moments ago. These are the lines in the amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that require that these check cashing businesses post a sign in English and Spanish, of their services. I think it is illogical for Members to require that. There are many languages, if we wanted to indicate to minorities and their needs in this country, many languages beside Spanish that we should have such announcements in.

Indeed, what I really oppose is the effort that it represents that we are moving toward a bilingual society where we have to publish things in more than English, which is the language of this country. I think that is a very serious step for Members to take, and one that should not be taken without a full measure of debate and consideration.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHUMWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, again I emphasize that this is a model statute to be used by the States, either in toto or in any part they see fit for the State. Now, any State of the Union, any legislature in a State of the Union can pass this as it appears today or they could delete any part of it or add any part of it.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, reclaiming my time, I know the gentleman has labeled this as a sense of the Congress resolution, and therefore there is that discretionary quality to it. However, at the same time, it represents a statement by the Federal Government that States can, perhaps should, take action to move Members in the direction of becoming a bilingual society. I do not think that is a smart thing for Members to do, and indeed, if we are going to do it, we should debate it fully and understand all of the consequences of doing so. We should not bring it here in the context of a money laundering bill, a bill which all Members basically like, and are prepared to vote for and support, and recognize the need for, but not to lead Members into areas of becoming a bilingual society.

It is for that reason that I offer the amendment and urge its passage.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. As I stated earlier, this is a model statute. It is merely the sense of Congress. It is not binding on any State, and that any State can add any part of this legislation, delete any part of it, or add any part they want to. I believe if there is a State, and within that State there is a certain segment of the community which is being victimized by check cashing agencies, and the majority of those people do not understand the English language, we would be helping those people try to alleviate the situation by allowing them to understand what the regulations are so that they could not be cheated by nefarious check cashing agencies.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOGLIETTA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, why do we say "Spanish and English?" Why did we not say "Chinese and English," with all the other languages that other people might speak.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. That is the point I am trying to make. If this was in California and we had a segment of the Chinese people in San Francisco who are being victimized, and the legislature in California wanted to change this and say part in Chinese and English, they are perfectly able to do so.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield, the legislature in California is not going to change a Federal statute if they see a Federal statute.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. This is merely the sense of Congress. They could pass their own legislation based on this legislation.

Mr. SHUMWAY. If the gentleman will continue to yield, if that is the gentleman's purpose, I suggest we leave out the reference to Spanish or any particular language, and say if States deem it necessary they can put this in another language, and then we are not identifying one langauge in preference to others.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. This is merely an example, I think, that we are suggesting to the various States.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word. I intended to support the gentleman from Pennsylvania's amendment. I think I understand what he is trying to do, and I want to be supportive of that, but I think the gentleman from California has a good point here, and I think it would strengthen the gentleman's amendment to take out the language, that the gentleman from California has proposed. I say that for this reason: The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows a little bit about my district. It would make no sense for the State to write a piece of legislation that would cover my whole district, saying that we have to have Spanish language posted in my district. In downtown Lancaster, PA, that might make sense as there are a lot of Hispanics in that part of the area. However, out in the rural areas of my district it would make a lot more sense to have Pennsylvania Dutch as the language that was there, or in some parts of my district it would make sense to have Vietnamese as the language that should be on the sign. So to write into Federal law, to suggest that what we are doing here is creating an equality between English and Spanish as it affects the entire country seems to me to be exactly the wrong direction to go. There are many areas of the country that have no Spanish-speaking people in them, and we are requiring them in particular language to post the language in Spanish, regardless of whether or not there is any Hispanic population. I think I understand what the gentleman is trying to do. It seems to me that the language would have been better to say if there is a preponderance of some other language, that the signs ought to be posted in another language to increase the understanding.

But the way in which this is worded here is very confusing, and I think it makes a statute that is different from what we might want to do.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. I would like to address the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY], if I may. If I accept the amendment to my amendment, can I then be assured that the gentleman would accept the amendment as I presented it?

Mr. SHUMWAY. No, if the gentleman would yield.

Mr. WALKER. I have the time, and I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

I gave several reasons why I oppose the amendment, one of which was the English-Spanish provision. I appreciate resolving that question, but I still have opposition in general to the amendment.

Mr. WALKER. But, Mr. Chairman, let me assure the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if this question is resolved, I will feel comfortable supporting his amendment, but for some of us who have a hangup about this other provision, this may be going a little bit overboard. I think the gentleman can win the support of a number of us for his amendment by making this kind of modification or at least by accepting the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOGLIETTA].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOGLIETTA], as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently, a quorum is not present. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the pending question following the quorum call. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TORRES: Page 46, strike line 20 and all that follows through page 48, line 11, and insert the following:

"(A) the identity of the beneficiary of the funds transfer and the beneficiary's institution and the account number, if any, of the beneficiary at the beneficiary's institution; and

(f) RULE OF CONSTRUCTION.—The amendment made by subsection (a)(1) shall not be construed as affecting the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury under any other provision of law to prescribe regulations which require records to be kept or reports to be made, including records and reports relating to funds transfers.

Mr. TORRES (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the Torres amendment be limited to 30 minutes, equally divided between the majority and the minority.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman include within that request any amendments to the amendment?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, yes, and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, if I can understand the gentleman's request, it would be 30 minutes, 15 minutes divided on each side?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is correct, equally.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's request is for 30 minutes total of debate on the Torres amendment and any amendments thereto to be divided equally, 15 minutes in support of the amendment and 15 minutes in opposition thereto.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, all I can do is suggest the gentleman talk to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE]. I made the agreement with him.

Mr. HILER. Further reserving the right to object, the difficulty, Mr. Chairman, and I would say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], the chairman, it is a very complicated amendment, and I think we need more than 30 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I could eliminate all amendments thereto and have a straight 30-minute debate on the Torres amendment, 15 minutes on each side.

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, of course, we do not know what amendments will be offered, so we cannot foreclose somebody from offering amendments.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILER. Further reserving the right to object, I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would suggest to the sponsor of the bill and the sponsor of the amendment that perhaps we should just start the debate and see how the debate develops, and if there becomes a problem with time, if the Congress is for some reason rushed to get on to another bill, then we can consider it, but it seems to me it is premature to consider this at this time.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my request. We are wasting time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the House Banking Committee, I have been advancing legislative proposals in the area of money laundering for a number of years. Money laundering proposals I offered were enacted in both the 1986 and 1988 omnibus drug bills. Cooperation by our Nation's banks to combat money laundering has improved significantly over the past several years. However, there are still some areas that can be improved upon.

Today I come before you to offer an amendment that addresses the problem of money laundering through international wire transfers. Wire transfers have become the way that high-volume launderers move their drug money. Officials estimate up to $100 billion in illegal drug profits are wire transferred out of the United States each year.

The legislation reported from the committee is a good, sound package of antimoney laundering proposals. However, it is seriously deficient in this area.

Each year, trillions of dollars are wire transferred in and out of the country in the normal course of legitimate, worldwide business. The system is so efficient, it takes just 40 cents and 3 seconds to move $1 million halfway around the world.

The problem is, drug profits look just like corporate profits to the computer. Because many of these transactions are done anonymously, it is nearly impossible for law enforcement to trace the illegitimate transactions. We need a mechanism, a recordkeeping system, that makes it easier for law enforcement agencies to follow the trail of drug money moving through the wire transfer system.

H.R. 3848, as reported, requires that the Treasury Department issue final regulations on recordkeeping for international wire transfers by the end of this year. I contend that we cannot continue to wait for regulations while billions of dollars of drug money are sent through our financial system without a trace.

My amendment would require the Treasury Department to implement a pilot program of recordkeeping for international wire transactions. The targeted program would be limited and left up to the Treasury Department to design. Treasury would have the discretion to decide which specific banks and categories of international wire transfers—such as dollar amounts and countries to which transfers are made—would be involved in the pilot program.

My amendment would only stipulate the specific information that the customer would have to supply to the bank. This is an important point. Rather than penalizing the bank for failing to provide information it has no way of obtaining, the burden is on the customer to provide the bank with the specified information.

The information required would be basic information about the transaction; a name, an address, an account number, and any third parties that might be involved. This is the information that law enforcement officials say they desperately need to help them trace the flow of drug money and to expose intricate money laundering operations. I would further point out that much of this information is already routinely kept by banks.

The program would be targeted in order to see how it works in the field. The Secretary of the Treasury, after 1 year, would then have to certify to Congress that the program is cost effective, useful to law enforcement, and not detrimental to legitimate commerce, before the program could be implemented on a nationwide basis.

I also want to stress that my amendment allows for exemptions from the recordkeeping provisions for certain routine business transactions. It is estimated that up to two-thirds of all wire transactions could be exempted from the recordkeeping provisions. This allows law enforcement to focus on those suspicious, illegitimate transactions likely to be linked to major drug operations.

As you all know, just last week, based on information they obtained after the United States invasion of Panama last December, the Justice Department ordered that accounts be frozen at 173 United States banks and that bank records be turned over to law enforcement. Over 90 percent of the money involved in these accounts was wire transferred in and out of the United States. This points to the very need for my amendment.

Our U.S. attorneys have told me they can't get the information they need with the present system. My colleagues, it shouldn't take an invasion of Panama to gain this information.

Furthermore, it shouldn't take a revolution in our computer technology to maintain this information. The computer technology already exists for the maintenance of these records.

I want to stress that this is not a CTR system. There is no paperwork involved. There are electronic messages with the information maintained on the file tape.

To illustrate, I would like to just compare how wire transfers are done on two of the main computer networks used by our banks, the SWIFT system which is a communications network owned by international banks, and the U.S. FedWire System, which is a payment network operated by the U.S. Federal Reserve System.

The SWIFT system already contains the fields of information required by my amendment. In SWIFT, to send a wire transfer to another bank in the world, you must have the name of the originator, that is the person requesting the transaction.

You must also identify the beneficiary with a name and account number. If someone overseas attempts to enter a customer transfer on the SWIFT network, and does not include the name of the originator or does not include the name of the beneficiary, SWIFT will reject the transaction and not send it on to its destination.

That is an important difference. In the U.S. FedWire system that is no requirement whatsoever to identify the originator of the transaction. The only requirement the Fed has is to identify the sending bank that is on line with the Fed network. On the receiving side of the transaction, only the beneficiary's account number is required. The FedWire system requires very limited data.

Thus, it is very easy within the FedWire format to disguise a transaction by not using any names whatsoever. Because it is not traceable, drug money is easily concealed over the FedWire system. We just cannot allow the Federal Government to continue to be the unwitting conduit for drug money in this way. In a world where computer technology can move a trillion dollars across the world in milliseconds, I assure you it is not going to require a technological revolution to record the kind of information my amendment requires.

In closing, I would just like to quote from Justice Department testimony to the House Banking Committee earlier this year on my legislation:

It is in our enforcement interest to have the Government require banks to maintain a record of all the information essential to tracing the ownership, origin, and disposition of a wire transfer. This would, in fact, include the name, address, and bank account number of the originator, the beneficiary, and any other real parties in interest to the transaction.

My colleagues, my amendment will provide exactly what the U.S. Justice Department requested. Let's move forward. Let's get a pilot program working out there now, so that we can have, as soon as possible, a nationwide system that prevents this movement of drug money for the gain of the drug cartels. A vote for the Torres amendment is a vote to stop our Federal Government from being a conduit for drug money.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. AuCoin). The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. Torres] has expired.

(At the request of Mr. Bartlett and by unanimous consent, Mr. Torres of California was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Moody].

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from California [Mr. Torres] several points. One is, would there be excessive costs to the banks to implement this? Could the gentleman elaborate on the cost situation?

Mr. TORRES. At this moment we have no calculations as to cost. We do not anticipate that there will be any great cost. But that is the whole purpose. We do not know. This is what the study would show. I do not contend, as I have heard before, that this is going to be exhorbitantly costly on the system. I do not believe that. After all, we are only going to be looking at those suspicious, I repeat, suspicious, transactions. Two-thirds or more, most of the commercial transactions, will not be needed to be looked at.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, my next question, this will be a pilot program, is that correct?

Mr. TORRES. That is correct, it is a pilot program.

Mr. MOODY. It will not be all-encompassing, all-sweeping?

Mr. TORRES. No. It is a 1-year study that the Secretary of the Treasury will be in charge of. The Secretary will target the areas that are necessary to study. In 1 year, after the Secretary reports back to the Congress that has been effective, that it has not cost a lot of money, that it has not disrupted the marketplace, it could stay. If the Secretary finds that it has not done any of those things, then it would be sunsetted.

Mr. MOODY. So the administration would have it within its power not to continue the program at that time?

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, that is correct.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE]. As the gentleman knows, there are strong rumors that we will probably rise at 4:15 to continue work on the budget. I would like to finish the work on this bill. If it is agreeable with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE], I would ask unanimous consent that all debate on the Torres amendment be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes for the majority, 15 minutes for the minority. In view of the fact that the majority has already taken 5 minutes, we can make this 15 minutes for the majority and 20 minutes for the minority.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is very fair. I agreed to that proposition earlier, Mr. Chairman. I think the amendment can be adequately debated in 30 minutes. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] had very generously suggested that he take 15 minutes, that I have 15 minutes, and the time would have been equally divided. Now the gentleman is suggesting that he have 15 minutes and I have 20 minutes, since the majority has already taken 7, and I would suggest that that is a good proposition. I would like to see us finish this matter.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would say that this a very complicated amendment. As it has been described right now it sounds very well-meaning. It is a study, a pilot project. But there are a lot more ramifications.

If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] will recall, these same arguments were made before our committee and the amendment was defeated.

Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], is he going to support this amendment or not?

□ 1530

Mr. ANNUNZIO. I have allowed 35 minutes, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to listen to the debate. The gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] stated that this is a different amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. AUCOIN). Does the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD] continue to reserve the right to object?

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, further reserving the right to object, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. We want to complete the bill this afternoon. If we pull it off, we will not be back for 2 or 3 weeks.

Mr. BARNARD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] will be recognized for 15 minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] will be recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I yield my 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES].

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] controls 15 minutes of debate.

There was no objection.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me. I would like to commend him for bringing this to the floor.

Although I believe this amendment would have some people a little bit nervous, let me assure Members this is a very, very important amendment. My colleagues, take a lot of time, listen to the debate on this one. As the chairman of the International Narcotics Task Force of the Foreign Affairs Committee, I can assure Members that we would have been doing this had we had the jurisdiction directly over this issue.

There is no more single component today more important in the fight against drugs than trying to dry up the places where the money, the profit from these drugs can be transported and hidden. There is no doubt in my mind, or in the mind of a great many others who work in this subject day to day that if we can hit them in their pocketbook, if we can deny them their money laundering capability, we can effectively get to them ultimately under the law enforcement provision.

The money allows them to buy security. It allows them to buy cover. It allows them to buy their freedom.

We can remove that. This is not an onerous program. It just calls on wire transfers for additional information that has already got a wire transfer attached to it. Just give the name and the address and the destination, that is all it says. It is a pilot program. It is something the U.S. Government should have been doing years ago on its own, and it only deals with international transfers.

Ladies and gentleman, I implore Members before dismissing this because it is something that has some rough edges or the bankers have told them it is a little bit of a problem, this is a very imporant amendment and I commend the gentleman. This is money laundering at its essence and we need to do away with it.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to this amendment.

So that the position of the Justice Department will not be misunderstood, I have a letter here from the Justice Department indicating that they believe that the statutory language on wire transfers as suggested by this amendment would be premature at this time. The Justice Department takes the position of the Treasury in allowing Treasury the time to work with affected agencies, including consultation with the Federal Reserve and a thorough comment period for the industry to respond prior to moving forward with this final regulation.

This would involve over 100 million wire transfers each year. It is not as if we are not doing something. We think that it would be way too expensive and unnecessarily burdensome on banks.

The American Bankers Association is opposed to the amendment. It is opposed by Treasury. It is opposed by the Federal Reserve Board, and it is opposed by the Justice Department. The law enforcement agencies say they do not need it, and do not want it in its present form.

I think the McCollum-Barnard provision already in the bill gives Treasury the power to require such reporting where needed. We have asked them to report back to us by January 1, 1991 with a regulation with reference to wire transfers and its effects on the payment system.

Wire transfers are a highly complex operation. This amendment would envision placing these recording requirements on over 100 million wire transfers. We have a CTR reporting requirement in the law at the present time, and I wish Members could see the form that is required for every bank to fill out.

Operation Polar Cap was mentioned a little earlier as a reason for supporting this amendment. That investigation was the result of vigilant bankers who had indicated that there was something awry and they called the Justice Department. Through cooperation with the Justice Department, and with the bankers involved, we saw that one of the most extensive money laundering operations in our history was discovered and eventually prosecuted.

It is suggested that the Torres amendment would help us examine Panamanian banks. Nothing could be further from the truth. All this does is add to the potential cost to financial institutions with little or no benefit to enforcement. I suggest that the amendment be defeated, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HUBBARD], a member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES], yielding to me for 2 minutes.

I urge my colleagues to vote no on the Torres amendment to H.R. 3848. This amendment would change section 9, the wire transfers provision of that bill.

Section 9 of H.R. 3848 gives the Treasury Department, in consultation with the Federal Reserve Board, discretion to decide what recordkeeping requirements are necessary for international wire transfers. The House Banking Committee approved the current language of this section, the McCollum/Barnard substitute, which does not include domestic wire transfers, by a vote of 32-17. The committee agreed that the usefulness of keeping records of international wire transfers should be tested before imposing a harsh, new regulatory burden on financial institutions, especially small community banks like the ones in my district and elsewhere.

Mr. TORRES originally had intentions of placing recordkeeping requirements on domestic as well as foreign wire transfers. He then concentrated just on international wire transfers and the Banking Committee agreed. The Treasury Department has already proposed recordkeeping requirements for international wire transfers. We should let the Treasury determine if these are going to be useful.

The Torres amendment, which is before us today, is almost exactly the same amendment defeated in committee. The Torres amendment is too broad, would place an unreasonable affliction on banks and it is unwarranted at this time.

Congressman WYLIE has already listed the Federal Government agencies who oppose the Torres amendment.

The Independent Bankers Association of America and the American Bankers Association have announced their opposition to the Torres amendment.

I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD] and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM] who stated in a "Dear Colleague" this week that "we should uphold the judgment of the Banking Committee in providing regulatory flexibility by voting against this amendment."

H.R. 3848 is a comprehensive bill containing a number of provisions establishing and extending programs to discourage the practice of money laundering. As it is presented, this bill is a good compromise. I urge my colleagues to oppose the Torres amendment.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MFUME].

Mr. MFUME. Mr. Chairman, I rise obviously in strong support of the Torres amendment. I think it is a step in the right direction.

But let us talk for a moment about what it does and does not so that we are absolutely clear about what we are talking about today. This amendment establishes a pilot program for 1 year, and it deals with the international transfer of funds, and it suggests that almost two-thirds of those transfers will not be affected at all.

What we are simply asking for is the name and the address and the account number of people making these international transactions. It allows also after 1 year for the proper Government agencies and the Treasury Department to come back and to certify before us that it is cost efficient and that it is working, and if they do not, then it ends. That is what it really does.

We have to find a way to stop allowing banks in this Nation to be the conduit for drug money.

And I recognize the concern of bankers. We have talked about this issue. This amendment represents a pulling back, a compromise of the original position of Mr. TORRES.

So if we are at that point, let us clearly then get on the record one way or another. Let me say to you and remind myself that the people of this Nation who are hurting in our communities because of drug abuse and drug violence and drug crime are not interested in the academic arguments as to why we ought to do this. They are asking why not? And it comes back over and over again in resounding ways, a pilot 1-year program to get a name and an address and an account number so that we can stop what is happening in our communities with drugs.

I hope the banks would come out and embrace this. I think it is the right way to go. It moves us toward action rather than keeping us in a state of inaction.

So I would urge my colleagues, as a member of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control and on the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, to give very, very serious consideration to supporting the Torres amendment.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM], the coauthor of the McCollum-Barnard amendment.

Mr. MCCOLLUM. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise rather reluctantly to oppose this amendment of my friend from California because in principle we support the same thing. I want to see and I know he wants to see that we have the right kind of records being kept on anybody who is trying to use our monetary system and our banks and our community financial institutions to move money throughout the world that comes from drug sources and drug crimes.

There are huge numbers of these transactions that occur all the time. It is very hard for us to find them, trace them and track them down.

What I really find myself in a pinch about, though, is the fact that we did, in the committee, put something in this bill that accomplishes what the gentleman really wants to do, without the onerous and burdensome requirements that he now would come back with his amendment, in my judgment, and impose upon the financial institutions.

I have been senior Republican, ranking member on the Subcommittee on Crime over in the Committee on the Judiciary for a number of years as well as being a member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

In the process of drafting money laundering legislation not too many years ago, we came up with a scheme of cash transaction reporting. That is not exactly what the gentleman wants here, but it is the idea of keeping a record of every time that somebody deposits in an account somewhere $10,000 or more in cash or any time a bank moves it inside this country, an amount involved to that degree, so that our law enforcement officials could have a record to go back and find out, if it were of importance to them, that there was a large amount of cash or maybe to raise a red flag.

We have discovered now in the process of auditing that, law enforcement has discovered, and Justice and Treasury, that they rarely ever use this.

Now I wish that they did it more often. I am glad we did what we did, but looking back on it we were creating a huge pile of paperwork already that is not being utilized.

So the question is how do we get at wire transfers which are taking the moneys overseas as opposed to these cash transactions in the country.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD] and I came up with alternatives to Mr. TORRES in committee, and it is already in this bill. It is very simple. It gives a requirement, it does not just give the power, it requires the Department of the Treasury by January 1 of next year, requires Treasury now to promulgate regulations that it deems are appropriate to ensure that insured depository institutions maintain such payment records orders which involve international transactions and direct transfers of funds in the wholesale transfer system on the books of depository institutions, as will have a high degree of usefulness in criminal, tax, or regulatory investigations or proceedings.

My point is this is in the bill now. It gives maximum flexibility to Treasury, but it requires them to do it. It requires them also to consult with the Federal Reserve in doing it.

The problem I have, again, with the gentleman from California's amendment today is that he is going to spell out in very little detail how it has got to be done. The originators have to do this, the beneficiaries have to be found and do this and so on, in detail.

That is going to be very expensive, with 150 million of these transactions per year. My records that I have seen say 400,000 per day of these going overseas.

We do not need to do it. The Federal Reserve says we do not need to do it that way. The Treasury does not want that burden put on them and law enforcement, the Justice Department, DEA, the people who have to read these things, say they do not need this and they really do not want it. They will be happy and they want some regulation that they would like to work with Treasury on defining on about how to go about doing this. But not to have Congress sign every—cross every t and dot every i. That just does not make sense.

As to Operation Polar Cap, which the gentleman mentioned earlier, that does not have anything to do, unfortunately, with CTR's. That had to do with an awful lot of effort made by different people in our Federal law enforcement and in conjunction with what happened in Panama to be able to find a lot of these money launderers but very little to do with the CTR's, cash transaction accounts, or anything we propose to do here. I wish it had.

Frankly I had worked very hard on the CTR's before the current existing domestic system to require every bank to do it for everything. I do not want to make that same mistake, and I do not think you do either, my colleagues, of putting that burdensome requirement on the wire transfers, especially when wire transfers across the board overseas involve a whole lot more work on the part of these financial institutions.

Let the Treasury narrow the scope, let them decide, working with the Federal Reserve and law enforcement officials, exactly how they want to craft the regulations. Let them promulgate those regulations to get maximum benefits in those instances where there are potential criminal activities that can be resolved because the records are kept.

But do not, do not, put a burden unnecessarily out there for them.

I realize the gentleman calls this a pilot program. What I propose is not a pilot program. What is in the bill is a demand. The regulations have to be promulgated now forever. There is nothing piloting about it. I really do not want to see a pilot program. We do not need one.

What he is proposing would be a pilot that perceives a lot more than what is envisioned in the current bill.

I urge a "no" vote on the amendment.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. KAPTUR].

Ms. KAPTUR. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Torres amendment.

As I was listening to the debate, I could not help but think about all the laws that we pass here and then they go over to the departments and agencies, and they develop regulations that seem a mystery to those of us who passed the original law.

I think it is important, as I rise in support of the Torres amendment, to think about what we are talking about here because we are really seeing the Treasury Department, which is the one in the committee print, the McCollum amendment, and the others who supported that in the Banking Committee, asks the Treasury to develop regulations.

Well, I do not know whether or not we should just be listening to the Department of the Treasury in this situation. I think the Department of Justice also has something to say about information that they need to truly enforce the law.

A recent newspaper article from the Miami Herald, a New York customs agent said:

> Electronic transfer is the last bastion of unregulated money movement in this country. The wire transfer system has thus become indispensable to the drug trade.

We all know that as we have begun to enforce through the Money Laundering Act that our chairman and others worked so very hard for, money has been moving offshore. In fact, there is a lot of smuggling cash offshore that is going on at this point.

The Torres amendment is a very good addition to the bill, it enhances the bill and it will not create onerous recordkeeping because it simply asks Treasury to establish a pilot program of recordkeeping for international, not domestic, only international electronic transfers.

We know the money is going there; we merely want to track it.

This amendment rightly asks the Treasury Department to have discretion as to which specific banks and categories of these international wire transfers would be involved in the pilot program. But it does say, and this is where we ask the Treasury to be a bit more vigilant, according to what the Justice Department testified, to ask that the name, address, bank account number of the originator of the transfer, the beneficiary and any other real parties in interest to the transaction also be included.

We know our U.S. attorneys cannot get the information they need with the present system.

I ask for adoption of the Torres amendment.

Mr. TORRES. I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARNARD] the coauthor of the McCollum-Barnard substitute.

Mr. BARNARD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

My colleagues, it is awfully difficult to get here and try to argue against some process by which we would be able to interrupt money laundering in the country.

□ 1550

There is nothing more highly emotional today than the idea of trying to punish those who would benefit from drugs. For that reason I certainly commend my colleague and friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] for his amendment. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. MCCOLLUM], the coauthor of this amendment that is in the bill, has fully explained why the compromise that we have in the bill, and why it was passed by the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. The Torres amendment, while very well-meaning, is overkill. It is overkill from the standpoint that it is going beyond what is necessary to do—not that wire transfers is not important, it is important, but first of all, we are eliminating the major number of wire transfers because we are eliminating in the Torres amendment all domestic transfers.

The next argument is that we need to get the names. We need to get all the information about wire transfers, and we do that. We do that as international transfers, like the one which can involve SWIF in the Federal wire, in such a case Federal wire transfer will contain the same originator and the beneficiary information that is included in the SWIF message, and this is contrary to the assertion in the Torres statement and in his letter.

Friends, it is just a matter of, are we going to use this information? Right now, the currency transactions reporting system was well meaning, but it is not accomplishing nearly what it was set out to do, and now we go with wire transfers. They are better than 100 million, let me repeat, 100 million international wire transfers annually, where a party is either a receiver or the sender. The amendment could impose an additional cost on each one of them, somewhere to the tune of $10 to $15 by the Federal Reserve estimate. Now, even if 75 percent would be exempted from the amendment requirements, we are talking about an additional cost to the financial institutions of $360 million a year. This is very cumbersome, and we do not know if it is going to be that beneficiary.

The point is that what the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] is trying to do is being accomplished in the bill. I would hope that we would understand that. If we would reach the amendment, the Torres amendment, it would indirectly strong-arm or at least strongly encourage into certifying the Treasury, into certifying after 1 year that all of the provisions of the gentleman's amendment which are very detailed, very lengthy, they are micromanaging, where it includes what, who, where, what all that needs to be recorded. After such a certification, the 11 pages of amendments would kick in with the Secretary of the Treasury only being able to make exceptions to the requirements by establishing an amount floor of what is to be recorded. In other words, give the Treasury an opportunity, give them between now and 1991, an opportunity to really study this.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL], the chairman of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Torres amendment. There is some indication that it is not needed, that it is already in the bill, the Treasury is going to do this anyway, that all we have to do is wait and we will be able to catch up with the drug barons and the drug traffickers that somehow have managed to manipulate a system far better than the Treasury has been able to detect it, and do something about it.

It would seem to me that every time we take a look at the drug traffickers, they outman enforcement, they have more sophisticated guns, they have more sophisticated distribution systems than law enforcement. If we do not think for 1 minute that the banking industry does not know what these drug traffickers are doing, then Members are putting themselves on. If we do not think they are making a big profit out of it, and if we do not think that international bankers are not involved in this, then we are not being honest. If what we are asking for is a pilot project to find out how we can really get a handle on this situation, I assume that the Treasury will come forward in conference and convince the conferees, one, what they have already done, and I haven't read anything new. Has anything new come to any committee to show how many people we have been able to indict and send to jail as a result of abusing the electronic system? Of course, if they already have this in the bill, I am certain that my dear friend from California would accept it as being the law. Therefore, I welcome the opportunity to have exciting debate about this, and I do hope that the day will come that it will be all Members against drug traffickers, rather than finding out how much burden we are putting on our dear friends in the banking industry.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SHAW].

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Chairman, I stand in strong support for the Torres amendment. I think the gentleman from New York just very eloquently put out exactly where the problem is. We now have a law in place that says that any cash deposit in excess of $10,000 requires reporting. However, we have built this nice little bucket, in order to try to contain and keep up with the money-laundering schemes throughout the United States, but in constructing this bucket, we never put a bottom on it, and the bottom is wire transfers. If we are going to have this particular law with regard to cash transactions within the United States, it does not make any sense at all to say that the money from abroad can be wire transferred into our banks, at any time, without any reporting requirements

As I understand the Torres amendment, it gives wide regulatory authority to the Treasury to come up with regulations, and even to amounts that would be required to be reported. As I understand, it simply requires the name of the originator or the real party in interest to be made known, the identity of the recipient, and the next institution in the fund-transfer chain. If that is going to cost $30 a deposit, then the banking business better start figuring out how they will manage their particular deposits and how they will manage their business, because I would be astounded to believe that competent businessmen could not come with a better scheme of things that would not cost $30 a deposit. In any event, even if it did, Treasury has the power and the authority under the Torres amendment to set the regulations, to decide what size of transfer they are talking about.

Doing this, I think, will solve a problem. It is a year's trial program, a pilot program, one they would look at. I commend the author of the amendment, and intend to support it, and I hope my colleagues will support it. It could solve a very big problem.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Chairman, H.R. 3848 is a good bill. It is a bill that is worthy of passage here today, and one that all Members should be proud of, but we can very quickly ruin a good piece of legislation by adopting amendments like the one which is now pending.

We discussed this amendment, or one very similar to it, in the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. It was withdrawn, and in place of it we adopted the McCollum-Barnard amendment by a vote of 32 to 17.

What surprised me, in the opening statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES], was his reference to the fact that this amendment will not require any increase in paperwork. Let me show to Members the kind of paperwork that is required. We refer to this as the CTR, currency transaction report. This is a detailed report calling for items like Social Security numbers, employer identification numbers, that have to be signed at the bottom. Two pages of detailed information are called for, and then another couple of pages of very fine print requirements as to what this report should contain. I spoke this morning to a representative from a medium-sized bank in New York, and he told me his bank, which was very typical of many, processed 18,000 wire transfers per day.

□ 1600

For some of us who think this might be easy to just put this on the computer and let the machines fill out the numbers, let me say that they cannot do that. This would have to be done by hand, signed by hand, and for 18,000 per day or 1 million wire transactions per day across the country, it would simply be an impossible chore we are placing upon the industry.

I think, Mr. Chairman, it is a far better procedure for us to take to allow the Treasury to implement the regulations. In fact, it has already issued an advance notice of rule making. That happened last October. They would implement those regulations by the end of the year, and actually if we go that route, it would result in action against money laundering sooner than would be achieved under the Torres amendment.

For those reasons, Mr. Chairman, the Feds strongly oppose this amendment, the Treasury opposes it, the majority of the Banking Committee has voiced its opposition to the amendment, and I urge the Members to vote against it.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to close, and I have one more speaker.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE], who represents the committee's position, has the right to close, unless it is otherwise resolved by unanimous consent or by agreement between the parties.

Mr. TORRES. The gentleman stands corrected, then, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] wish to yield time?

Mr. WYLIE. May I ask, how much time remains on each side, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] has 6 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILER].

Mr. HILER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

I rise today in strong opposition to the Torres amendment. The bill, as reported out of the committee, strikes the proper balance concerning wire transfer recordkeeping requirements. The Torres amendment would impose costly, burdensom requirements that would have little, if any, effect on the war on money laundering. By ignoring the recommendations of the regulators in this highly technical area, we may also end up inadvertently impeding law enforcement efforts to fight money laundering. I urge my colleagues to defeat the Torres amendment.

Section 10 as reported out of the Banking Committee strikes a proper balance between the legitimate needs of law enforcement officials and the objective of having an efficient international payments system. The administration, the Treasury, and the Federal Reserve Board all strongly oppose the Torres amendment and any other attempts to restrict their flexibility in getting information on money laundering. The language of section 10 as reported out of the committee represents a compromise offered by Congressmen MCCOLLUM and BARNARD. The McCollum amendment was overwhelmingly passed by the committee. It is supported by the regulators, law enforcement officials, and industry groups.

In examining this area we must be reminded of the history of currency transaction reports [CTR's]. Six million CTR's are collected each year and not a single one has ever been used to initiate a prosecution. In the wire transfer area, the same result may well occur if the Torres amendment is passed. Moreover, we run the risk that the technology will far outpace the language of the Torres amendment and we will have inadvertently damaged law enforcement efforts by focusing the regulators on the requirements of the Torres amendment.

Section 10 in the bill makes a strong statement for law enforcement action against drug kingpins using the wire transfer system, but also permits the regulators the flexibility to use the recordkeeping requirements in an efficient and effective manner. The Treasury is required to promulgate regulations in cooperation with the Federal Reserve Board and defer to the Board in areas concerning the payments system where the Board's expertise is well established. These regulations could be modified over time to most effectively target money launderers.

Severe problems could develop in the international payments system if the Torres amendment was adopted. United States banks handle as many as 25,000 to 35,000 international funds transfers each day. The great number of these payments are related to Federal funds, securities, and foreign exchange transactions of large institutions, governmental entities, and financial organizations.

The routing of funds transfers is highly complex and generally completed without human or manual intervention. An intermediary bank will have information about a correspondent institution but may not have information related to the real party in interest to the transaction or the ultimate beneficiary or originator. For purposes of processing the payment, it is often unnecessary. Moreover, U.S. banks may not be able to require their foreign correspondents or customers to provide this information since it may be protected under foreign law.

Requiring U.S. banks either to refuse to handle funds transfers which do not contain certain information or to obtain the information before or after processing the transaction will enormously increase the costs of making these transfers, diminish the efficiency and importance of the payments systems in this country, and could lead to greater use of offshore dollar clearing systems. It is far more prudent to allow the appropriate regulatory bodies to promulgate regulations which address both the needs of law enforcement officials to curtail and identify money laundering and the important need of maintaining the efficiency, competitiveness, and speed of onshore dollar clearing and settlements systems, than to promulgate legislation that would adversely affect an essential part of the U.S. payments mechanisms.

Finally, let me say that nothing in section 10 impedes the Treasury from promulgating additional regulations as they see fit. The Torres amendment merely represents additional restrictive micromanagement that may have perverse results and may inadvertently hurt, rather than help the war on drugs.

I urge my colleagues to support the bill as reported out of the committee and to defeat the Torres amendment.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DREIER].

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment my friend, the gentleman from Pico Rivera, CA, for his hard work on this issue. I am convinced that we all have the exact same goal here, that of trying to deal with the scourge of illicit drugs and the use of financial institutions to launder money, but there is no doubt in my mind that, as the gentleman from Georgia said, this amendment is overkill.

In the committee we offered a substitute which, by a nearly 2-to-1 margin, passed over an amendment that was very similar to this.

While we all want to deal with this issue, there is no doubt that the area of our society which wants to deal with this more than any other is the law enforcement area, and yet law enforcement has said repeatedly that they do not need or want this amendment to be passed. As the gentleman from Ohio pointed out, the Treasury, the Federal Reserve, and the Justice Department are all opposing this amendment. We know it is far too burdensome, and we know that the costs are onerous.

As my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY], pointed out, the recordkeeping process itself would be way too much, and as I was saying in my opening statement today, that cost obviously is going to be passed on to the American consumer, with no benefit whatsoever in dealing with this very serious problem.

We know that flexibility is something that is absolutely necessary, and I think that we should do everything we can to ensure that that flexibility which is needed exists. The prospect of reporting 400,000 wire transfers a day or 150 million a year is, I believe, too great a cost to pay. I think if we look at the work the full Banking Committee has done on this measure, we will see that it is a model piece of legislation, and I hope very much that it passes without this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair might advise the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] that he has 2 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. WYLIE. I have one additional speaker, Mr. Chairman, so I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. TORRES. Mr. Chairman, I have one speaker remaining, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER], to whom I yield 3 minutes for closing remarks.

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Torres amendment to this bill.

The Torres amendment is very simple. People are making such huge, huge negative arguments against it that it is hard to believe that all it does is set up a pilot program to be administered on a targeted basis by the Treasury Department to deal with wire transfers. It will expire after 1 year unless the Secretary of the Treasury certifies that recordkeeping is cost effective, useful to law enforcement, and not detrimental to legitimate commerce.

If we do not pass the Torres amendment, we will leave a huge, gaping loophole in this bill, because, as my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEHMAN], pointed out, we are telling Mr. Excobar and Mr. Ochoa, the drug lords, "Oh, transfer your money this way because if you do it by wire, the bill will not be effective." We are simply creating a fiction if we do not pass the bill in that way, because the transfers of money by those who wish to launder it will be by wire, plain and simple.

We have heard about balancing. But what are we balancing? Yes, the banks will have to do some extra paperwork. Maybe it will cut back on the paperwork in our prisons; maybe it will cut back on the paperwork in our drug treatment programs; maybe it will cut back on our paper work in the morgues where thousands of people die from drug overdoses.

Where the heck is our sense of priorities? Yes, this will mean a little extra paper work for a 1-year pilot program, but it may well do something to stop those people from laundering drug money, and that is the source of why they push drugs on our people, so they can get the money, launder it, and then use it legitimately.

I think our priorities are a little warped if we vote against this amendment. This amendment is a plain and simple amendment. It says, "If you want to be tough on the war on drugs, if you want to stop money laundering, then don't allow a typical means of transferring money from bank to bank to be used, that is, the wire."

Mr. Chairman, this is not a permanent program, it is a carefully drawn program, and I say to my colleagues if we cannot vote for this, then we are not serious about the war on drugs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. TORRES] has expired.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE] for closing remarks.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I yield my remaining 2 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ERDREICH].

□ 1610

Mr. ERDREICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment for a variety of reasons, but it seems to me fundamentally the approach of the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] is "Let's legislate and then study it," whereas the bill has within it what I think is the way to approach the problem.

Mr. Chairman, the bill mandates, requires, that the Treasury by January 1991 will and shall come forward with regulations dealing with wire transfers, which is exactly what we want to get at, exactly what the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] indeed wants to get at, but again I would say that the way to approach the problem is to not legislate first and then study. It is to develop with law enforcement, with the Justice Department, with the Treasury's involvement, a workable approach to get at wire transfers, and that is what the bill does as it is written.

Mr. Chairman, this member, as I believe the entire members of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, and I know the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES] as one, and all Members of the House want to get at wire transfers, want to get at drug dealers that are using wire transfers, and that is why the bill has in it, as written, a strong, a firm, way to get at wire transfers by involving law enforcement in the front end, developing the necessary regulations, mandating those to be on the board, in place, by January 1991, and we get at the drug launderers of this country and around the world, and we do have international problems to deal with, and that is an aside issue really, Mr. Chairman, but we need to carefully craft what we do so that we do not violate certain obligations we have with other nations in dealing with wire transfers and international transfers of funds.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I would urge my colleagues to reject this amendment, support what we have put in the bill in its current form, which mandates wire transfer regulations with Treasury, by January 1991.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. TORRES].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 127, noes 283, not voting 23, as follows:

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I have had an opportunity to study the gentleman's amendment, to read it, and I will accept it.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALKER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is acceptable to me, and we accept it on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. RANGEL

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RANGEL: Page 61, after line 11, insert the following new section:

SEC. 19. REPORTS ON AMOUNTS AND DENOMINATIONS OF CURRENCY CONFISCATED IN CONNECTION WITH DRUG SEIZURES AND DRUG-RELATED MONEY LAUNDERING.

(a) COLLECTION OF INFORMATION.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of the Treasury shall collect and maintain information on—

(A) the total dollar amount of Federal Reserve notes (and any other currency) which are confiscated by law enforcement agents in connection with the seizure of any controlled substance or any enforcement action with regard to a drug-related money laundering operation; and

(B) the total dollar amount of each denomination of such notes and other currency.

(2) INFORMATION PROVIDED BY OTHER AGENCIES.—In the case of any confiscation described in paragraph (1) by any Federal law enforcement agents who are not employed within the Department of the Treasury, the head of the department or agency in which such agents are employed shall promptly provide the information referred to in such paragraph to the Secretary of the Treasury.

(b) PLAN FOR COLLECTION OF INFORMATION FROM STATE AND LOCAL AGENCIES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary of the Treasury shall develop a plan for obtaining from appropriate agencies and departments of State and local governments information on the amounts and the denominations of Federal Reserve notes (and any other currency) which are confiscated by State or local law enforcement agents in connection with the seizure of any controlled substance or any enforcement action with regard to a drug-related money laundering operation.

(2) REPORT.—Before the end of the 90-day period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit a report to the Congress on the plan developed pursuant to paragraph (1), including such recommendations for legislative or administrative action as the Secretary determines to be necessary to implement the plan.

(c) PERIODIC REPORTS ON COLLECTED INFORMATION.—The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit a report to the Congress containing a summary of the information collected and maintained by the Secretary under this section at the end of each 6-month period beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act.

(d) REPORT ON NEED FOR ADDITIONAL INFORMATION.—Before the end of the 90-day period beginning on the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall submit a report to the Congress on what other information (in addition to the information maintained pursuant to subsection (a)) would be needed in order to determine—

(1) whether Federal Reserve notes in denominations of $50 and $100 are used primarily for drug trafficking and other illegal activities; and

(2) the feasibility of withdrawing Federal Reserve notes in denominations of $50 and $100 from circulation and the deterrent effect such withdrawal would have on drug trafficking and other illegal activities.

Mr. RANGEL (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANGEL. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from New York for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have had an opportunity to read and study his amendment, and I will accept it.

Mr. RANGEL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANGEL. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Chairman, is this the amendment which would require a study by the Treasury to determine the feasibility of removing large bills from circulation, $50 and $100?

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, yes, it is.

Mr. WYLIE. I think a study is indicated, and I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

I have long been concerned that the availability of large denominations of currency makes it much easier for drug traffickers to conduct their operations. This amendment which I am offering will require the Secretary of the Treasury to collect and maintain data on the amounts of the denominations of Federal Reserve notes which are confiscated by Federal and local law enforcement agents in connection with the seizure of any controlled substance or any enforcement action related to drug-related money laundering operations.

The Secretary of the Treasury was required by the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, Section 6187, to conduct a study of the feasibility of withdrawing $50 and $100 Federal Reserve notes and whether those notes were being used predominately for illegal activities. The act required Treasury to report back to Congress on its findings.

The report, which was submitted in September 1989, concluded that withdrawing currency in these denominations would have a negligible impact on criminal activity. Unsatisfied with the Treasury's findings, I requested GAO to review the Treasury's conclusions and the basis for those conclusions.

GAO reported back to me on April 20, 1990, and concluded that there was an inadequate factual basis for the Treasury's determination. GAO said that Treasury officials acknowledged that little information has been gathered or maintained on the denominations of currency used in illegal activities investigated by Treasury agents such as money laundering and drug trafficking. Treasury officials agreed that the statistical and economic data used in its study was neither current nor complete. GAO also confirmed that information is not routinely collected or maintained on the denominations of currency used in illegal activities. GAO concluded that until such time that the Treasury or the Federal Reserve record sufficient data on the denominations of currency used in illegal activities, GAO did not believe a valid study of the use of $50 and $100 bills in illegal activities is feasible.

Thus, the purpose of my amendment is to require the Treasury to collect the information GAO says we now do not have so that we will know the extent to which large denominations of currency are used to facilitate drug trafficking and drug related money laundering. When, according to the Treasury, 62 percent of the total value of U.S. currency in circulation is either in $100 or $50 Federal Reserve notes, it only makes sense to determine how much of these large denominations are being used for drug trafficking, drug money laundering, and other illegal activities.

My amendment will also require the Treasury to develop a plan to collect such information from State and local law enforcement agencies, to report to Congress every 6 months on information collected regarding denominations of currency seized, and to inform Congress of any additional information the Treasury would need to determine the extent to which large denominations of currency are used for illegal activities and the deterrent effect that withdrawal of such denominations from circulation would have on drug trafficking and other illegal activities.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RANGEL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the Rangel amendment to H.R. 3848, and would like to compliment the gentleman on his efforts.

For the past four Congresses, Mr. RANGEL and I have introduced legislation to replace existing $100 bills with newly issued notes to severely hamper the money laundering efforts of narcotics traffickers. As we know, it is through money laundering that traffickers are actually able to realize their profits and, thus, continue their scurrilous trade.

As Mr. RANGEL has already pointed out, his amendment would require the Treasury Department to gather information which the General Accounting Office has deemed necessary to make a fair determination regarding the feasibility of replacing those $50 and $100 bills currently in circulation.

The Rangel amendment is not only reasonable and sound but, if we are truly serious about throwing every possible monkey wrench into the drug trade, its adoption is absolutely critical. I urge your support for the Rangel amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to the bill?

If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. MURTHA] having assumed the chair, Mr. HUGHES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House of the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3848) to require the appropriate Federal depository institution regulatory agency to revoke the charter of any Federal depository institution which is found guilty of a crime involving money laundering or monetary transaction report offenses and to require the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation and the National Credit Union Administration Board to terminate the deposit insurance of any State depository institution which is found guilty of any such crime, pursuant to House Resolution No. 378, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 406, noes 0, answered "present" 1, not voting 26, as follows:

Mr. BUNNING changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to require Federal depository institutions regulatory agencies to take additional enforcement actions against depository institutions engaging in money laundering, and for other purposes."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on H.R. 3848, the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURTHA). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, I was absent from today's vote on H.R. 3848, because I was part of the official United States delegation to the inauguration of Violeta Chamorro as President of Nicaragua, which is led by Vice President QUAYLE. Money laundering is a serious problem in my district, as well as the Nation, and had I been present I would have voted in favor of H.R. 3848.

EXPLANATION OF ABSENCE

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, I was not present for three rollcall votes because I was a member of a delegation appointed by President Bush to attend the inauguration of Nicaraguan President Violeta Chamorro. Had I been present, I would have voted "no" on rollcall No. 80, "no" on rollcall No. 81, and "yes" on rollcall No. 82.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, had I been present, I would have voted "nay" on rollcall No. 80 and No. 81 and "aye" on rollcall No. 82.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I was absent for three votes. Had I been present, I would have voted as follows:

Rollcall No. 80, H.R. 3848, money laundering/check cashing fees: "yea."

Rollcall No. 81, H.R. 3848, money laundering/recordkeeping: "no."

Rollcall No. 82, H.R. 3848, money laundering/passage: "yea."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. BALLENGER. Mr. Speaker, I accompanied the Vice President to Nicaragua for the inauguration of President Violeta Chamorro, and was not present during consideration of H.R. 3848, the Depository Institution Money Laundering Amendment of 1990.

Had I been present, I would have voted "no" on the Foglietta amendment (rollcall vote 80), "no" on the Torres amendment (rollcall vote 81), and "yea" on final passage of the bill (rollcall vote 82).

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be on the House floor when the House voted on H.R. 3848, the Depository Institutions Money Laundering Amendments of 1990. Had I been here, I would have voted: "Nay," on the Foglietta amendment; "Nay," on the Torres amendment; and "Yea," for final passage for H.R. 2848.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1991

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of Tuesday, April 24, 1990, and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310).

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995, with Mr. GRAY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the order of the House of Tuesday, April 24, 1990, the concurrent resolution is considered as having been read the first time.

The gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] will be recognized for 3 hours and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] will be recognized for 3 hours. Said time will include a period of 3 hours on the subject of economic goals and policies.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to briefly yield myself such time as I may consume to describe the pattern for the general debate on the budget resolution as we have worked it out with my ranking minority member, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

We have 6 hours total debate. The way that will be divided is that 1 hour on each side will be reserved for the Budget Committee, 1 hour on this side to be given to the Joint Economic Committee, and I believe that is similar with regards to the minority side. And then 1 hour will be allowed for the Black Caucus.

□ 1700

The time of both, the Joint Economic Committee as well as the Black Caucus, will be controlled by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] from the Joint Economic Commitee and by the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] on our side from the Black Caucus.

It is my intent tonight, and I think we have worked this out in conjunction with the minority, that we would take up about 20 minutes on each side for the Budget Committee and then allow the Joint Economic Committee to proceed with their hour, and then return back to committee time for those who may still be here who wish to present statements. Then we would reserve approximately an hour on each side, 2 hours of debate tomorrow before we proceed into the amendment process.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman inform the House as to what the plans are for ultimately voting on the amendments and on final passage of the resolution?

Mr. PANETTA. As I understand the rule, it would provide first of all we will complete the 2 hours of debate tomorrow and then we will proceed to the adoption of the rule and then, upon the adoption of the rule itself, we would proceed to consideration of two amendments, the substitute amendment by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH], and the substitute by the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

That would conclude the business for the day tomorrow.

Next week, on Tuesday we would complete action on the remaining substitutes, which would be the Black Caucus substitute, the President's budget, and, obviously, the final vote then on the committee budget.

Before I introduce the resolution, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RUSSO].

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, as you know, Amtrak's assets are depreciating at a rate of $165 million per year. I would like to ask the chairman what assumptions are included in the committee's budget resolution regarding Amtrak. More and more Americans are looking to Amtrak to provide an energy-efficient and environmentally benign alternative to congested highways and airports. Amtrak has been doing better and better and now plans to eliminate any need for Federal operating support by the year 2000. This is a goal I believe we all should support. In the interim, Amtrak will need increased capital to invest in new equipment and modernized facilities.

Would the allocation for function 400: transportation accommodate sufficient Amtrak funding to meet its fiscal year 1991 capital needs?

Mr. PANETTA. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. RUSSO. I thank the chairman.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 310, the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1991. I believe this is the most significant budget the Congress has considered in a decade or more. It is significant not only because of what it contains but also because of the unique time in history in which we have the good fortune to be serving in this body.

Some 170 years ago, Thomas Jefferson, in a letter to John Adams, wrote the following:

> The flames kindled on the Fourth of July 1776, have spread over too much of the globe to be extinguished by the feedable engines of despotism; on the contrary, they will consume these engines and all who work with them.

I don't think Jefferson expected that we would have to wait until near the end of the 20th century for his words to come true. But the "engine of despotism" are being consumed day by day around the globe, and we are closer than we could ever have imagined to the day when the flames kindled by our own Declaration of Independence spread to all mankind.

In a time of dramatic and inspiring change around the world, we cannot respond meekly any more than did the founders of our Nation.

As we begin this debate on the budget, let us not forget that budgets are not just dollar signs and numbers. They represent priorities and commitments—what we stand for as a nation. Today, we have an opportunity to reorder our priorities—to recognize that it is time to rebuild America, restore our economic leadership in the world, and begin to address the painful unmet needs which have grown in our society over the past decade.

In order to accomplish these goals, the President and the Congress—together—need to make some tough choices. If we are going to eliminate budget deficits and address the needs in our society that are virtually crying out for attention, we need to engage in a cooperative effort. Frankly, that will not occur in a divided government as long as either political party seeks to blame the other for the inevitable sacrifices involved. And until it does occur, it is up to the Congress to move forward with the budget process.

The budget resolution adopted by the Budget Committee responds to the fact that the greatest test of our Nation's leadership in the 1990's will not be a military one but rather the challenge of competing in an increasingly complex economic environment and addressing our society's equally complex problems.

It responds in a very strong way to the unique opportunity provided by events in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe and to the challenges we now face as a nation.

Our budget contains the following elements:

First, it is a 5-year transition budget that reorders spending to reflect changes in the world. It contains a gradual reduction in defense spending accompanied by new investments in critical policy areas like education, research, health, housing, transportation, and drugs. These investments are as essential as they are overdue.

In this respect, the contrast between the President's budget and the committee budget is clear: The President talks about education; the Democratic plan includes an investment of $2.5 billion in key education programs—five times that proposed by the administration. The President talks about the crisis in transportation; the Democratic proposal commits $1.3 billion more to this effort than does the administration. The President talks about a "kinder and gentler" society but proposes to cut key housing and child nutrition programs; the committee proposal increases funds to meet those needs. And we propose an increase of $2.1 billion for programs to improve the Nation's competitiveness and provide economic adjustment assistance for those affected by defense cuts; the President proposes cutting these programs by $825 million.

In addition, this budget, for the first time, removes Social Security from the deficit calculation and achieves a budget surplus without including the Social Security surplus in fiscal year 1995, the fifth year of the plan. It does so despite using more realistic economic assumptions than the administration's beginning in fiscal year 1992.

The resolution meets the Gramm-Rudman deficit targets for fiscal year 1991 through 1993, again with more realistic economic assumptions. It achieves a Gramm-Rudman deficit of $63.75 billion in fiscal year 1991, when the target is $64 billion; $16.1 billion in fiscal year 1992, when the target is $28 billion, and a surplus of $2.35 billion in fiscal year 1993, when the law requires a balanced budget.

The fact is, this budget produces greater net deficit reduction than the President's budget in every one of the 5 years it covers. Over the 5-year period, it achieves $382 billion in deficit reduction, compared to $299 billion in the President's budget.

Finally, also for the first time, the reconciliation legislation required by the resolution must produce savings over a 5-year period, as well as in the first year. This will discourage both tax and spending measures which produce short-term savings but have substantial long-term costs.

I would like to address some of the specific areas of the budget. The first is the defense budget. The committee budget sets defense spending at a level of $283 billion for budget authority and $295.5 billion for outlays. These represent reductions from the CBO baseline of $32.8 billion in budget authority and $11.5 billion in outlays. These reductions are the first in a multiyear policy that is intended to reduce defense spending by 25 percent by fiscal year 1995. This is a gradual and prudent decline in defense spending that recognizes the obvious and irreversible weakening of the military threat to this country and to our allies. It is a significant reduction that is well within the recommendations of many defense experts and is flexible enough to change in response to changing conditions. Indeed, even by 1995, funding would be only 12 percent less in real terms than the average funding for defense from 1950 to 1980, a period encompassing the Korean and Vietnam conflicts and the height of cold war tensions.

About half of the savings from defense would go to deficit reduction in fiscal year 1991. The other half would be used to make long-overdue investments in critical areas like education, research, health, housing, and transportation in order to restore the Nation's economic edge and its human commitments.

The investments are divided into seven categories.

The first is competitiveness. We propose investments in programs to improve the Nation's economic competitiveness in order to restore our Nation's economic leadership in the world for the 1990's and beyond and to assist workers affecated by economic change and defense reductions to find and qualify for new jobs.

These include support for basic research, new and expanded math and science education programs, increases for the National Institutes of Health for new researchers, support for the development of technologies which can be used in the private sector, and programs to help U.S. businesses to compete in the world market.

The next category is investments in children, who are this Nation's future. We propose large increases in education programs with proven track records such as compensatory education and Head Start. We also include the resources needed to fund the child care legislation already passed this year by the House as well as a new program to help the growing number of abused children of chemically dependent parents.

The third category is investments in nutrition, health, and housing which are designed to help mend the frayed safety net that is supposed to protect our most disadvantaged citizens. Major investments are propsed in low-income and rural housing programs and homeless assistance programs. The nutrition investments expand and strengthen the Food Stamp Program, particularly for those who face high shelter costs, the Temporary Emergency Food Assistance Program, and the WIC Program. The health program investments include expanded Medicaid assistance to reduce infant mortality and improve care of children, the frail elderly, and the mentally retarded, and substantial increases for AIDS research, education, testing, and prevention.

Next, the committee proposes investments in the areas of science, research, and space to create knowledge and improve economic competitiveness. These include additional resources for the National Science Foundation, research programs at the Department of Energy, and a series of NASA programs, including the space station, the Earth Observation System, and other manned and unmanned space programs.

The fifth category is investments in human security. These are programs that address the serious drug and crime problems plaguing not only our large cities but also small towns and rural areas.

The sixth category is investments in environment and infrastructure. These include investments in transportation, specifically the Nation's highways and aviation programs; the Environmental Protection Agency to handle its rapidly growing workload; Superfund to clean up abandoned hazardous waste sites; and land acquisition to help preserve our natural resources by the addition of national park land, forests, refuges, and other preserves.

The final category is international democratic development. With free elections bringing into office democratic governments from Nicaragua to Poland and with citizen uprisings toppling totalitarian governments in other Eastern bloc countries, this funding is critical. The flames of liberty are spreading before our eyes, and we have an obligation not to douse those flames but to help make sure they flourish by helping these countries to develop democracy and promote economic growth. The committee recommendation contains funding for a new package for emerging democracies in Eastern Europe as well as new initiatives in the Caribbean, the Philippines, Nicaragua, and Africa.

Finally, the committee budget also reverses a number of unfair and discriminatory domestic spending cuts proposed by the President. It assumes, unlike the President, a full cost-of-living adjustment for all retirees, including not only Social Security retirees but also Federal, military, and civilian retirees. It also provides for a full 4.1 percent cost-of-living pay adjustment for Federal civilian and military workers to take effect in January 1991 compared to a 3.5 percent increase in the President's budget. It also substantially reduces cuts proposed by the President in Medicare and in farm programs.

Mr. Chairman, we have a unique opportunity to shape the future of our country and indeed the world. Regardless of political differences, the Nation's leadership cannot afford to ignore that challenge. This budget makes the most of the opportunity. It presents a clear alternative for the Nation. If it passes the House and if the Senate passes a budget as well, it can set the stage for the kind of cooperation between the Congress and the administration that is essential to the future of our Nation. It's a rare opportunity for our country at a rare time in our history. We cannot afford to miss it.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] has consumed 7 minutes.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, today's debate represents only the quarter finals in this year's budget playoffs. It is only a preliminary step toward what we all hope will turn out to be a championship multiyear budget agreement that balances the budget without relying on annual Social Security trust fund balances.

The budget resolution reported by the Budget Committee represents a bargaining position for the House Democrats. They understand, as do we, that this document will not be the one that guides fiscal policy.

Similarly, the President's budget submitted in January lays down his starting point for negotiations. We candidly admit that now, only 4 months later, this document is out of date in a number of important respects. The events in Eastern Europe and in Central America are only partially recognized. The need for working capital to deal with ongoing savings and loan problem was known in January, but the procedures for raising the working capital had not been agreed upon and therefore are not reflected in the President's budget. The unlying economic assumptions, used also in the Panetta budget, seem less likely to be realized. Therefore, even as a bargaining position, the President's budget will need some updating.

Everyone participating in this debate understands that this is not a "real" exercise. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget tells us that because of slower than expected growth in the economy in the last quarter and other factors including the need to raise working capital for the S&L situation, realistic projections for the fiscal year 1991 deficit are at least $8.5 billion higher, and could be as much as $20 billion higher, than initially forecast.

Neither the President's nor the Democrats' budget if fully implemented would reduce the deficit enough to avoid a massive and disastrous sequester in October. And we must be frank—neither of these budgets is likely to be fully implemented. The President's budget assumes a number of policies and results which have scant chance of coming true. The Democrats have gleefully adopted those policies and cynically added a few more of their own.

So what we have here are bargaining positions, not blueprints. The measure of success in today's debate will not be whether one or another bargaining position is adopted. To continue the analogy, it will be whether this step moves us to the semifinals, and then on to the real bargaining table where Congress and the President can compromise their differences and agree to a multiyear approach that will balance not only the Gramm-Rudman budget but also the non-Social Security portion of the budget. Implementation of that final policy document will constitute the final victory match. If we play it properly, we can all be winners.

I would like to focus for a few minutes on the kind of position the Democrats have staked out in their budget resolution. In many respects, it is a typical Democratic plan. It raises taxes, cuts defense, and spends a lot of money, down payments on expensive domestic initiatives.

The Democrats' budget is first and foremost a tax bill. It nearly triples the Bush revenue recommendation.

Plugging in President Bush's proposed $13.9 billion in fiscal year 1991 revenues is only the Democrats' starting point. Under the Bush proposal, annual revenue increases dwindle to $5 to $6 billion by fiscal year 1995, but under the Democrats' budget annual revenue increases grow to $23 billion. Thus over the 5 years, the Democrats would rake in over $100 billion in tax increases, more than twice as much as the $42 billion under the Bush plan.

But that's not all. The President's $13.9 billion revenue increase for fiscal year 1991 includes three items that the Democrats would impose on top of the $13.9 billion. These three items are: The collection of $3 billion in additional revenues as a result of beefing up the IRS budget and implementing IRS management reforms; $1.55 billion from extending the telephone excise tax; and $0.9 billion from stabilizing the collection of payroll taxes. Adding these three items to the $13.9 billion brings the Democrats' total new taxes to $19.4 billion in fiscal year 1991 and $117 billion over 5 years.

For good measure, they complete the revenue package by giving the Ways and Means Committee open-ended permission to raise additional taxes to pay for entitlement expansions above and beyond those spelled out in the budget resolution.

We are particularly disturbed by the levels established for defense spending in this budget. The $33 billion cut in budget authority and $11.5 billion cut in outlays are not based on a coherent strategy for building down the Nation's defenses in response to a careful assessment of reduced threat. Instead, the cuts are derived by deciding how much money was needed to finance new expensive initiatives, and then simply pretending that much money could be safely cut from somewhere.

The Budget Committee does not know how—or whether—these cuts can be accomplished in reality, and neither do the Armed Services Committee nor the Appropriations Subcommittee on Defense. It is doubtful that Congress can agree to any combination of immediate military personnel layoffs, abrupt production line halts and base closures necessary to comply with the sudden, sharp defense reduction required to achieve this budget. Other Members will discuss this problem at great length so I will not dwell on it here, except to observe that we should not be cavalier about destroying the investment we have paid so dearly for over the last decade. We need a builddown, not a meltdown, to quote Senator PETE DOMENICI.

We agree with our Democratic colleagues that United States defenses can and should be reduced in response to developments in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. But we disagree strongly with them on how much of this reduction can be accomplished in fiscal year 1991.

After cutting defense and raising taxes, the rest of the Democrats' budget runs true to form in avoiding any specified serious cuts in our nondefense Federal spending. True, some tough-sounding savings are mentioned, but checking the fine print shows that over $9 billion in savings have not been reconciled for fiscal year 1991. That means they cannot and will not be realized.

Under Gramm-Rudman, the budget process focuses heavily on the outlay figures and often neglects budget authority. Because of the massive military cut in budget authority contained in the Democrats' budget, their total budget authority for fiscal year 1991 is actually $8.4 billion lower than President Bush's. Last year, the Appropriations Committee had a very difficult time living within their allocation of budget authority and several subcommittees restored to highly ingenious and creative accounting wizardry. If they have to adhere to the BA level established in the Democrats' budget resolution, it may become necessary to borrow from domestic subcommittees to help cut defense or to raid slow spending accounts to finance more immediate program needs. I do not think that the Congress is prepared for what this budget authority level will mean.

In fact, the Democrats' budget provides for increasing domestic discretionary programs $18 billion above their 1990 levels. And new initiatives worth $97 billion over 5 years get the go ahead, including nearly $15 billion in permanent entitlement increases. This is no way to cut the deficit.

Particularly troublesome is $7.2 billion in Medicaid increases over 5 years. States whose budgets are already strapped will be forced to match the cost of these Federal mandates. For this reason, Governors take strong exception to this budget.

Having described where Democrats and Republicans differ, I would like to point out one important item on which we agree. We are all strongly in favor of moving just as quickly as possible toward balancing the budget without counting the cash excess in the Social Security trust fund. It is important that the Social Security trust fund pile up net savings for the Government over the next two decades so that the baby boomers retirement can be paid for without bankrupting the Nation. To do this we must stop using the Social Security trust fund to finance annual deficits in the rest of the Government's budget.

Budget resolutions are plans. They do not, in and of themselves, change the law regarding the calculation of the Gramm-Rudman deficit or surplus. To do that, separate legislation must be passed and signed by the President.

However, both the Bush budget and the Democrats' budget contemplate reaching a balanced budget not only by 1993 under the Gramm-Rudman rules which include the Social Security trust funds, but also within a few years after that without counting the annual cash excess in the Social Security trust fund. Both accounting and enforcing mechanisms to guide us to budgets that balance without relying on Social Security

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] has consumed 7 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER], a member of the Committee on the Budget, and a valuable member in her last term on the Committee on the Budget.

Mrs. BOXER. Mr. Chairman, as usual, although the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] does not think this budget is real, I think this budget is real. I think it will, in fact, set a standard for the appropriators as soon as they sit down and do their work. I think frankly, for him to say this is a meltdown of a military budget is an outrage. We are spending in outlays $1.5 billion out of a $300 billion budget, $1.5 billion less than last year. If that is a meltdown, I do not get it. As a matter of fact, there are many Members who will support the quality-of-life budget as well as the Democratic budget as a protest against the high number in our outlays in defense.

Mr. Chairman, let me say I have enjoyed working under your leadership, although this is my last term on the Committee on the Budget. I was very proud that the chairman appointed me to head the Health and Human Services Task Force.

The reason I am proud of this Democratic budget is it really looks at what the President gave Members, it uses the same number of revenues, it comes out with the same deficit. It is the same level of spending, but the priorities are clearly Democratic priorities. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I think that is why the people of America decided they wanted a Democratic House, because they take a look at the Bush budget, and what do they see? It decimates Medicare, it does not give anything to medical research on diseases that are the real threat to our country such as Alzheimer's, heart disease, cancer research, and AIDS. This Democratic budget looks at those dollars and says that that is where the threat is. The threat is that our kids are not getting educated. The threat is that we are losing our kids to drugs, and we take those same spending dollars, but we put a Democratic stamp on it. Mr. Chairman, I am very proud of your leadership in this regard.

I want to make one more point that I think is very, very important. I would hope that we do not wind up at a summit, because if we go to a summit, then all the power of the Presidency will come down upon Members and we will see higher numbers in the military, even though, Mr. Chairman, the world is changing.

□ 1720

We spent $175 billion defending NATO from the Warsaw Pact, and now the Warsaw Pack wants to join NATO. As a matter of fact, my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBIN], said the other day at the Budget Committee, "We always feared that the East Germans would come over to West Germany with millions of people, and they did, and they went shopping."

The fact is that we won the cold war. These are changing times. Why would we want to point our missiles at nations that are embracing our way of life?

I think as this debate unfolds, we will find that this Democratic budget takes us in the right direction. I also think that many of us will find comfort in the Black Caucus budget and the quality of life budget, and I predict we will defeat the President's budget because it is not kinder, it is not gentler, and it does not take into account the new military realities we face today.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GOODLING], a member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, early on in my tenure on the Budget Committee, I witnessed the establishment of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings process, and it was created to supposedly control, reduce, and ultimately eliminate our huge Federal budget deficit. However, instead of allowing for an orderly approach to deficit reduction, it really has provided Congress with the magical ability to make cuts without doing any cutting, a feat for which Harry Houdini would have been proud.

Let me give one example. We said last year that we were going to be down to a $100 or $110 billion deficit. We knew very well when that budget was presented that we were not anywhere near it, and I am sure that most people would indicate today that maybe we are at $150 or $160 billion. Who knows what that deficit will be?

In my 6 years on this committee, I have seen budget summits, bipartisan budget agreements, and differing degrees of partisanship and bipartisanship in the annual struggle to produce a Federal budget. The final result in most instances has been less than satisfactory, and in fact the only budget deliberations involving a bipartisan effort happened last year, and that was more the result of a mistake than anything that was planned.

Despite the able and professional leadership of the chairman, what does the committee have to show for its efforts this year? I will let the resolution speak for itself. Without belaboring the point, it is obvious that contributions from both the majority and the minority on the committee, complimented by input from the administration, are necessary to allow the budget process and the budget resolution to reflect an accurate picture of our Nation's needs and priorities.

The process, the politics, and the people invovled in crafting and adopting a Federal budget change over time, but the goal of eliminating the existing deficit remains one of our primary national concerns. Is a fundamental restructuring of the budget process necessary to realize this goal, or can we muddle toward a balanced budget through a combination of selective budget cuts and economic growth?

That is the $64 billion question, and particularly in 1991 it is the $64 billion question. The answer becomes more and more obvious every year.

Once again, the budget submitted by the President contains its share of questionable assumptions and shopworn ideas. Once again, the budget resolution reported by the House Budget Committee fails to confront the important fiscal realities and decisions necessary to achieve true deficit reduction, including the cost of the savings and loan industry restructuring. Once again, the committee chooses to use the optimistic economic assumptions put forth by the Office of Management and Budget, and once again the House of Representatives will be forced to consider a resolution which is neither honest nor workable.

Perhaps negotiations with the administration will allow for a better final product for fiscal year 1991. I certainly hope so. The existing budget process is flawed, but a number of constructive solutions have been proposed and I hope that some of those might be implemented.

Specific suggestions for reform such as establishing strict, mandatory timetables to insure prompt consideration of a budget resolution would help to limit congressional procrastination, a time-honored tradition which dooms the process from the word "go." At the least, however, I would argue that Congress must take its fair share of the responsibility for the sad state of current deficit reduction efforts; only then can we hope to address the short comings in the existing arrangement and provide a budget process befitting the seriousness of the task at hand.

As I indicated to the Budget Committee when we met the other day, I am the oldtimer as far as age is concerned there, and I do want to remind everyone that even though we may have studied in our history books that Chamberlain was the appeaser and we give him all sorts of grief because of what happened in the late 1930's and the 1940's, he was not an appeaser because he wanted to be an appeaser; he was an appeaser because he knew the United States, Great Britain, and France could not fight their way out of a paper bag, so he had to appease Hitler.

So I would remind the Members that things look rosy in some places, but I would not get carried away. It seems to me that someone, since we talk so much about the peace dividend, should give somebody some credit for the fact that perhaps being strong helped cause people to flee from East Germany to West Germany.

We have lost a lot of precious time. We should be presenting the Members today with a summit agreed-to budget so that the appropriators can get on with the business. Instead, we failed to do that. We failed, but I hope within a month we can present the Members with a realistic budget. Certainly not a way to become competitive, as the chairman spoke of, is to go the route of this particular budget that we are considering today. That will do anything but make us competitive.

Certainly we have to get on with the business of summitry. I will vote for the President's budget just to get that process moving forward. We cannot continue just another game of tax and spend.

The greatest unmet need in the American society today is Congress doing nothing about dumping $150, $160, $180, or $190 billion down the drain in the form of interest payments. Certainly that is not a way to make us competitive, and certainly that is not fair to our children who are going to have to pick up this load in the future.

Let us get on with our work. Let us have a bipartisan effort toward a summit so we can have a realistic budget to present to the Congress of the United States and to the American people.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Speaker pro tempore [Mr. DELLUMS] having assumed the chair, Mr. GRAY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995, had come to no resolution thereon.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION OF H. CON. RES. 301, CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1991

Mr. MOAKLEY, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 101-460) on the resolution (H. Res. 382) providing for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1991

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the order of the House of Tuesday, April 24, 1990 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310).

□ 1729

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. 310) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995, with Mr. GRAY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose earlier today, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] had consumed 13 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] had consumed 12 minutes of general debate.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GUARINI], who is also a member of the Budget Committee.

□ 1730

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the budget resolution. And I want to commend Chairman PANETTA for hard work, statesmanship, and fairness under difficult circumstances.

I have reservations about this budget. But our committee, and this House, must labor without Presidential leadership.

Under the circumstances, this resolution is the best we could do. It deserves our support.

Mr. Chairman, this should be the year we accomplish real deficit reduction. By doing so, we lay the foundation for the long-term domestic investment our country needs.

As dramatic events unfold in Eastern Europe, even conservatives like Richard Perle have called for a new defense strategy, which requires a changing defense budget.

But as of today, there is no strategy. We debate numbers without strategy, with minimal regard to a rapidly changing world.

As debt mounts—Government debt, corporate debt, consumer debt, Third World debt—we act like a developing country, depending on foreign capital, fearful of decisions made by investors abroad.

This should be the year we hold the line on spending. But it isn't. This should be the day we regain control of our economic destiny. But we won't. This should be the hour we declare our fiscal independence. But we can't.

Mr. Chairman, I fear for the day when Japanese investors have more to say about financing our economy than the Federal Reserve. When bond markets quake, as foreign investors decide how much longer they will finance our deficit. When Wall Street shakes, as Treasury auctions approach.

We need Presidential leadership, a bipartisan budget, and political courage. And we need it now.

Again, the budget before us is the best we can do under these circumstances.

There are some refreshing aspects to this budget. A 5-year reconciliation requirement. A $70 billion reduction in debt service; $250 billion over 5 years in defense outlay savings. Reinvestment in important domestic high priority programs which may go too far, but moves in the right direction.

And there are some not so refreshing aspects as well: $9 billion of unreconcilable "other savings and adjustments," the gimmicks originally proposed in the Bush budget.

All in all, I urge my colleagues to support this budget. Without it, we can all look forward to sequestration. Without it, we have no basis to begin the bipartisan negotiations that America truly needs. Without it, we would not achieve even the $28 billion of real savings that this budget does achieve.

In the end, a "slide by" budget with $28 billion of real deficit reduction is better than nothing. It is better than the painful sequestration that awaits us.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROGERS], a member of the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, despite the very able leadership of the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] and the great work of our ranking member, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL], I must speak out against this product of the committee on which I am honored to serve.

I say to my colleagues, "If you liked the Dukakis economic policy, you'll love this committee budget. It's full of tax increases, it decimates defense, it shifts huge sums of money from defense to social welfare spending, and it does little for the deficit."

Mr. Chairman, the committee budget will add $100 billion of new taxes over the next 5 years. The committee budget increases domestic discretionary and spending for new initiatives by $97 billion during that same 5 years, including $6 billion of new outlays for new programs in 1991.

Little headway would be made on the deficit, and this document settles the question, once and for all, of who is the party of tax and spend, and tax and spend.

Now the tragedy on defense:

Mr. Chairman, at first blush it might appear that perhaps the United States ought to seriously reduce its heavy sacrifice of money and men and women in the military. After all, 1989 was the year of profound changes in the world.

I wish we could afford to make significant cuts in national defense next year and target those savings toward America's very real domestic needs, especially our huge $3 trillion Federal debt, but, even though we are witnessing the defeat of communism throughout the world, that does not assure the victory of freedom. We still face challenges worldwide that pose serious threats and requires us to use great care in reducing our commitment to defense. Unfortunately, the proposal of the Committee on the Budget does not reflect this responsible build-down of America's national security needs. Instead it is a meltdown of America's military preparedness.

Mr. Chairman, hard realities tell us that we cannot assume that Moscow's current military restraint will continue. Because of its centralized authority, a future Kremlin leader could reverse the Soviet military course quickly and decisively. The United States could face yet another Soviet dictator in a cold war tomorrow morning, a war which we must face from a position of strength.

The Soviet Union could become the site of a massive civil war, the world's first to be fought on ground dotted with 11,000 nuclear weapons. A small number of troops who want freedom for one of their republics could conceivably take over a Soviet military base and its nuclear weapons and literally hold the world hostage.

Meanwhile, the diffusion of high technology weapons to potentially hostile nations has greatly complicated the global security picture. At least a half dozen nations are working to acquire nuclear capabilities, and a disturbing number of Third World countries are acquiring sophisticated military arsenals, including long-range missiles and chemical and biological weapons. Iraq, a nation that exterminated thousands of people with poison gas during its war against Iran, now threatens to turn its toxic chemical weapons against Israel.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, as events in the Middle East have demonstrated time and time again, dependence on imported oil for energy is a national security issue. Sadly, 16 years after the first oil embargo shocked the world, we failed to learn the lessons of history. Between 1984 and 1988 imports from the Persian Gulf jumped 113.5 percent, and, from OPEC alone, by 50 percent. As our reliance on OPEC oil continues, America may find itself compelled to act in the Persian Gulf to forestall any efforts that threaten our national security.

The newly free nations of Eastern Europe are still in danger. Winning an election or a revolution is difficult, but far more difficult is running a post-revolution government. Now that the people of these countries have rid themselves of communism, they face direct challenges in developing free markets, many for the first time in their history. During this transition millions may lose jobs, and prices will skyrocket, and drastic changes will take place. Those changes, along with the resurgence of ethnic conflicts, could ignite wars in Eastern Europe.

Mr. Chairman, how has the Democratic leadership responded to these challenges around the world? They slash $33 billion in spending authority from the baseline, and they cut $11½ billion in outlays in 1 year. Cutting $11.5 billion in outlays will mean huge cuts in manpower, military training and readiness, research and development, and regular maintenance of our equipment. It is a price we simply cannot afford to pay that quickly.

According to congressional estimates, the cuts for personnel could be as many as 200,000 active duty personnel and approximately 60,000 civilians in 1 year. Our budget decisions must reflect what the Secretary of Defense has called his top priority, preserving the high quality of American forces. If anything, the new global environment makes our personnel even more important.

In the coming decade, U.S. technological superiority will become more important and even more difficult to maintain. Considering the smaller size of our force and especially the global proliferation of advanced weaponry, U.S. forces must sustain their qualitative edge and take advantage of technological progress.

Unfortunately, the committee's defense numbers translate to an $8 billion reduction in spending authority, a $4 billion outlay cut in research and development, which will greatly undermine our doctrine of military deterrence and flexible response.

The Defense Department is continuing to modernize its procurement programs to avoid costly stretchouts, continue efficient rates of production and promote the introduction of new, more survivable weapons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman.

Mr. ROGERS. Although the President's budget continues this philosophy to cut marginal programs or those nearing completion of production runs, the Budget Committee cut $17 billion in spending authority and $3.5 billion in outlays for 1991, and we simply cannot afford it.

Mr. Chairman, we face great global uncertainty. America's best stance is steadiness in defense policies and posture. The Soviets have not made the mistake of equating withdrawal and restructuring with disarming, and neither should we.

We can afford some defense cuts, but they must have a comprehensive policy and strategy behind them. The defense cuts in this budget are not based on a coherent strategy and do not prepare us to undertake the enormous challenges that still confront us.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the Bush resolution when it is offered Tuesday, a plan that continues our steady decline in defense funding at a prudent and efficient pace, and if it fails I urge that we send this committee resolution back to the committee for further work. Let us not whittle America's future away in this first year by these huge cuts.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WISE], also a member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this budget. I think it is an excellent juxtaposition to have this budget presented by the Democrats versus the Bush budget, because I think it gives us a chance in this House to fully debate the priorities in this country, because that is what a budget is all about. The budget is debating priorities, and when we prepare a budget in our homes we decide how much for heat, how much for light, how much for food, how much for leisure, and so it is when you prepare a budget for the Federal Government, you also are preparing a budget for how much for education, how much for defense, how much for the vital functions of government. So let us look at the priorities.

The Bush budget, starting out with health and senior citizens, would cut $5.2 billion over the next year. That is $5.2 billion on top of a $2.5 billion cut last year.

What is the result? The result, for instance, in many of our rural areas is more hospital closings. We had five rural hospitals close in the last 18 months in the State of West Virginia. One reason was because of the inadequacy of Medicare. This would only compound that problem even more, adding $270 to every private pay patient's bill. That is not going to be sustainable very long by our rural hospitals.

On the other hand, the Democratic budget would cut only $1.7 billion, and that is only the amount that would be cut should this budget go to sequestration and suffer across-the-board cuts. The result will be hospitals that will not be closing, a higher reimbursement rate, more guarantee of care to our senior citizens.

I think there is a clear contrast. Some are concerned about the defense figure and say that $11.5 billion in outlay cuts is too much, that is from the Democratic budget, but let us put it in perspective, in perspective now of what the defense budget would be if you operated at the base line $306 billion, the President himself recommended a $4 billion cut, $11.5 billion in spending next year.

Are we saying that we cannot get that out of a budget of that magnitude? Surely we jest.

So it seems to me there are people who recognize the need to reduce defense fund spending. Look at what is happening in the world around us in Eastern Europe, Nicaragua which just inaugurated a new president, the Soviet Union, what is occurring there, and to suggest that we ought to continue funding at the same level, that type of defense establishment, I think flies in the face of reality.

Some have called this a meltdown. I think in light of what is happening in the talks that are taking place and will be taking place for nuclear reduction, this is not a meltdown. It is a dealtdown. We want the President to be negotiating and to be dealing down the size of defense expenditures on both sides.

I point to some other favorable comparisons between the House budget, the Democratic budget, and the Bush budget. The Bush budget, for instance, cuts the money for highways from last year. The House budget, the Democratic budget, not only restores what the President would cut from our vital highway program, but enlarges it so that it is over $1 billion more than what the President proposed. That is not just laying out miles of highways, filling potholes, building bridges, but that also goes toward creating jobs. Every dollar spent in this type of public investment yields more tax revenues, yields more economic opportunity.

The same in aviation airport improvement grants. We know that 18 of our major airports are badly congested. That number will double in the next decade. The Bush budget would cut back that program. This budget adds to it, so that we can continue forward, recognizing that the dollars spent today yield many more returns.

Education and NIH, the National Science Foundation, and going back to the NIH, when you are talking about vital cancer research, those things that make us healthier, those things that make us more competitive, the House budget, the Democratic budget, continues those initatives. The Bush budget, of course, either holds them at last year's level, in some cases gives them a slight increase, and indeed in some cases cuts them.

So I think the comparison is clear. For my State of West Virginia, there is no comparison. If you are talking about moving ahead, if you are talking about preparing for the future, if you are talking about Head Start, if you are talking about women, infants and children, if you are talking about education, if you are talking about infrastructure, if you are talking about economic development, if you are talking about all these things that go to make our way of life better to move us forward, then you have got to take the Democratic budget. The Bush budget offers nothing. It simply is a palliative to the past. The Democratic budget begins to move us ahead.

I urge that my colleagues adopt the Democratic budget and put this country on a steady process of investing in itself.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. McCRERY], another member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. McCRERY. Mr. Chairman, at the risk of confusing everyone, I am going to try to talk a little bit about budget authority and outlays. The major of the members of the Budget Committee, wanting defense to shoulder as much of the burden as possible in reaching the Gramm-Rudman target for 1991, picked out of the air a high outlay cut of $11.5 billion from the 1991 base line; but then when told that the easiest place in the defense budget to cut outlays is the personnel accounts, the Democrats on the committee said, "Well, we don't want all these cuts to be taken out of personnel, so we'll set a very low budget authority number, a high cut, a $30 billion cut in budget authority from the base line, and that will force the DOD to cut weapons programs."

Well, they were right, but what would they have us do? If the outlay and budget authority numbers chosen by the Democrats on the Budget Committee were to be put into law, this country would have to make unconscionable cuts in both personnel and weapons systems.

Why? Because to get the deep outlay cut proposed by the majority on the Budget Committee, you have to cut fast spending programs like personnel, and to get the deep budget authority cut proposed by my Democratic colleagues, you have to cut slow spending programs like weapons procurement, like strategic modernization programs designed to keep this country's nuclear deterrent credible and effective into the next century.

Let me give you an example of the extent of the cuts necessary to reach the budget authority and outlay numbers chosen by the Budget Committee majority. You might have to cut 200,000 active military personnel. You have to cut in addition to that 60,000 civilian personnel, and that is not all.

Then we get into the weapons programs. We might have to terminate the B-2, the D-5 missile, the SDI Program, the small ICBM Midgetman, the MX rail garrison program, cutback on the Trident submarine, plus three conventional programs, the Arleigh Burke destroyer class, the SSN-21 submarine, the attack submarine, and the F-16. Another example of what we might have to do to reach that combination of outlay cuts and budget authority cuts is cut 200,000 military personnel, do away with two Army divisions, one carrier battle group, one air wing of the Air Force, one Marine Corps expeditionary brigade, four Air Force tactical air wings, plus a whole list of programs here. I have about 12 programs here that would have to be cut or delayed to reach that budget authority number in the outlay number.

Mr. Chairman, there are many other possible combinations to reach those numbers, all equally bad, but that example gives us some idea of the size of the cuts which will be necessary if this budget is adopted by the Congress.

The bottom line is that we find defense is in danger of being driven solely by the budget and not by the legitimate security needs of this country. That, Mr. Chairman, presents a risk that this body ought not take.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to congratulate the Committee on the Budget for the hard work that they have put into this document. As the gentleman from California knows, for a number of years I have been expressing concern and attempting to change the method of accounting of our Social Security and other trust funds. For a number of years those trust funds and Social Security and other trust funds have been used to distort the true deficit that the Nation faces.

Last year I went before the Committee on Rules and attempted to get permission to offer an amendment that would take Social Security and other trust funds off of the operating budget and to place the accounting for those programs in separate categories so that they would not confuse the manner in which those funds were operated.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PENETTA. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman is absolutely correct. He was one of the first to discuss the issue of trying to focus on the non-Social Security deficit and unmask the real size of the deficit so that we would not be using the surplus from Social Security to do that. That has been an issue now that I think there is a broad consensus in the Congress that I think we have to focus on that non-Social Security deficit. The gentleman was there originally and speaking to this, and I commend him for the contribution.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his statement.

All trust fund money, whether the revenues come from outside the Government or from within, are earmarked to pay for specific obligations. They are not intended to pay for the general obligations of the Federal Government nor to be used in order to offset the deficit.

It concerns me that since 1982 the Government has literally borrowed billions and billions of dollars from Social Security trust funds to operate the Government. In fact, if we draw a time line out forward indefinitely, by 1998 my calculations predict that if nothing is changed that we will have borrowed over $1 trillion from Social Security trust funds.

I want to congratulate the gentleman for making a step away from that direction, and I think taking Social Security trust funds off of the budget is a step in that direction.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to spend a moment complaining about a matter that is of great importance in my district. That is the question of the budget as it applies to farm programs.

This budget proposes to cut farm program spending by $800 million just next year, and by $8.1 billion over a 5-year life of the farm bill that is now being prepared by the various committees having jurisdiction over that bill. Let there be no mistake, the 1990 farm bill that is yet to be sent from the Committee on Agriculture to the Congress for debate is being written right here this evening as we debate the budget resolution.

The agriculture policy for the 1990's is a numbers game, and the numbers that we put into the budget will drive the farm policy. For example, the wheat farmers in Arkansas will receive a smaller payment because of the numbers in this budget. The rice farmers will likewise be paid less on their deficiency payments on Government programs. The cotton farmers will likewise be experiencing smaller deficiency payments as target prices are cut by this budget resolution, and if this budget resolution goes into effect, the soybean farmers in Arkansas and all throughout the country are almost certainly going to be the biggest losers.

This budget resolution message to the soybean farmers is. "Forget all the brave talk earlier this year about a marketing loan for soybeans." The budgeteers know that the soybean marketing loan would cost money, and that under this budget resolution that money would have to come out of programs for other crops, and there simply will not be money available with which to fund a soybean program which is needed to provide for crop protection for the soybean farmers.

This budget resolution completely ignores the needs of those soybean farmers in Arkansas and across the South that are looking to Congress for protection for their products.

I would like to compliment the committee for increasing funds to fight the drug war. As we all know, Congress has tried to provide more funds to fight the drug war for a number of years. The current administration has offered a plan that has accelerated funds with which to fight the drug war, and the Congress, of course, is accommodating that plan in every way.

But I am very disappointed about the funds allocated for education. I personally feel that we are neglecting our youth and forsaking the future of this country by the low priority that our Nation places upon education of the youth who must be prepared to compete in a global economy in order for our Nation to be competitive during the years ahead.

Again, I thank the gentleman for his yielding to me.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes to respond to the gentleman from Arkansas on those issues.

Mr. Chairman, I recognize his concerns about agriculture. But, as the gentleman knows, the President cut out of farm programs something in the vicinity of $1.5 billion, and then if we add agricultural cuts in the Department itself, it is in excess of $2 billion that was cut out of agriculture. We, in this budget, have cut only $800 million from the farm programs, and we believe that that does help provide the room that the committee will need to try to respond to the needs in agriculture.

With regard to education, our view here is that the President talks about education but cuts education.

What we have placed in here is a $2.5 billion budget authority figure which is five times what the President has presented, and we think more than sufficient to try to at least begin to meet the needs of the future in terms of this Nation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, compared to the President's budget, this budget, of course, is much better for education and for the farmers. Is the gentleman saying that the President would cut the farm programs about three times greater than the budget resolution that is presented to us offers to cut?

Mr. PANETTA. The vicinity of in excess of $2 billion when we consider cuts in the Department itself.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman serves on the Committee on Agriculture. Would he try to explain to me the position that the soybean farmers might find themselves in in the President's budget compared to this budget? Is it not true that the soybean farmers are out in the cold on either budget?

Mr. PANETTA. There is no question that under the President's budget on the farm program of $1.5 billion cut out of farm programs, there is no question that not only the soybean farmers but all the farmers who depend on these programs are going to be seriously hurt. We think the number in the budget resolution gives the committee the flexibility to try to develop a proper farm program for the future.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will yield further, I appreciate very much the gentleman taking time to make that explanation and to provide some insight into the farm program here today.

□ 1800

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, we are about to pass into phase 2 of the general debate under the heading of the Humphrey-Hawkins debate.

Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, this debate on the Humphrey-Hawkins portion relates to economic conditions and our efforts to have full employment along with strong growth.

I think it goes without saying that the most important thing that this Congress can do to give us both of those wonderful goals, or to draw us closer to them, is to get rid of the deficit that has been plaguing our economy and our society for the last 20 years. We have a wonderful opportunity to do so this year. I am hoping that once we are able to dispense with these budget resolution preliminaries, we will be able to agree on a massive deficit reduction plan through negotiations with the President.

Mr. Chairman, to handle and manage the Republican debate on the subject of Humphrey-Hawkins and the goals for our economy, I now yield 1½ hours to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS], chairman of the Republican conference and third ranking leader and a distinguished member of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the package of economic proposals contained in the second introduction of the American Economic Opportunity Act.

The United States of America was founded on the principles of opportunity and the freedom of all individuals to make use of the opportunities with which they are presented. Lowering the cost of capital, offering incentives for savings, growth and investment, encouraging free trade, and requiring a responsible Federal Government to balance its budget are all legislative proposals that would expand opportunities rather than limit them.

While opportunity is the foundation of America, the "American Dream" has always included the opportunity for Americans to be able to purchase their own home. However, throughout the 1980's, the number of individuals under the age of 50 who own their own homes has been steadily declining. This decline is certainly related to the increasing cost of housing in most parts of the country.

At the outset of the 1980's I introduced legislation that would help Americans reach that "American Dream." My legislation would permit first-time home buyers to make penalty-free withdrawals from their individual retirement accounts (IRA's) to cover the costs of a downpayment. In the 101st Congress, I reintroduced my first-time home buyers legislation as H.R. 243, and I am very pleased that both President Bush and Department of Housing and Urban Development Secretary Jack Kemp have endorsed the proposals, and that it has been included in the American Economic Opportunity Act package of legislation.

First-time home buyers face a tremendous obstacle in the cost of a downpayment for purchasing a home. During 1989 in California, the median price of a home purchased by a first-time buyer was $162,500. That is a 16-percent increase over what first-time buyers were paying in 1988. I think that you will agree that a price tag like that is a substantial financial obstacle, especially in these days of declining savings rates. The first-time home buyers proposal encourages increased IRA savings while also combating the skyrocketing cost of housing.

In addition to the personal rewards of homeownership, it also has other significant and far-reaching implications for communities across the United States. Homeowners pay property taxes which support our school districts. Their taxes also help to finance many vital local services such as police and fire protection.

Clearly, homeownership will continue to play a central part in the "American Dream," and the ability for first-time home buyers to make penalty-free withdrawals from IRA accounts will increase the opportunity for Americans to reach this dream. I urge my colleagues to support both the legislative proposals and the greater economic goals of the American Economic Opportunity Act.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is somewhat like deja vu all over again. Last year several Members took to the floor during the Humphrey-Hawkins portion of the budget debate to highlight a Republican economic agenda. Much of that agenda was made a part of the American Economic Opportunity Act, of which a large portion was either passed by this body or is now under review by the executive branch.

Today, we again meet to discuss the Republican economic proposal, this time contained in the American Economic Opportunity Act, part 2, which I will be introducing in this body shortly.

Like its predecessor, it contains a sampling of GOP economic proposals that will propel our economic success through the 1990's. The surging economy we have witnessed these last 8 years is unparalleled. We are in the 89th consecutive month of the longest peacetime economic expansion in our history. Even after inflation, the economy is $1 trillion larger than it was in 1980.

This economic growth created 19 million new jobs and generated hundreds of billions of dollars of additional income for Americans.

The picture is not perfect, of course. It never is. But we have witnessed steady progress of late in everything from the trade deficit to personal savings.

In past years some of my friends on the left have espoused the view that the government should play a central role in fine-tuning our economy. We are seeing a resurgence of late of their calls for industrial policy. They are like, at least to me, runners who fall before crossing the finish line because they are more prepared psychologically for economic defeat than victory. Those same friends feel more at home making their annual predictions of recession that taking part in efforts to advance the economic opportunities of the American people.

Since 1982, the economy has grown an average of 3.9 percent per year. Last year we created 2.4 million jobs. Real per capita income, the after-tax income available to the average American, has grown 20 percent in the decade of the 1980's. Even the trade and budget deficits have been showing declining growth.

These are more than statistics. They are representations of a single truism: the degree to which individuals and businesses are restrained from achieving their enormous economic potential is directly related to the degree of government involvement.

On balance, our economic growth has truly been amazing. This economic progress is no accident. It is based on sound Republican principles that strive through low taxes and higher incentives to create an environment in which American ingenuity and effort can prosper.

Mr. Chairman, I will be yielding today to many of the people who have developed legislation adhering to these principles. Most of the proposals are part of either part 1 or part 2 of the American Economic Opportunity Act.

Before I yield to my colleagues, I will say for the RECORD that I will be taking part in the special order on the floor in the near future to discuss our economic legacy of the 1980's, and how that involvement has had unparalleled impact and success relative to the benefit to the American people. But for now, we will concentrate on our future.

Mr. Chairman, it is at this point I would like to begin to yield to Members who have specific concerns about our economy and have made a part of the contribution of which I speak.

Mr. Chairman, it would appear that my colleagues or the other side might have some comment regarding either their comments or my comments before I yield another hour and a half.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, what we would like to do is continue the camaraderie of exchanging thoughts on both sides of the aisle, rather than consuming all of the time on one side.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, indeed that would seem appropriate, especially since the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] has been more than generous with me in the past, and I know his remarks will be both restrained and refined.

Mr. PANETTA. Always. Always.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. OBEY].

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed with the remarks I intended to make, I simply want to take note of the fact that this is the first public opportunity I have had to express my regret that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] has taken an ill-advised decision to leave this place. I simply wanted to say that since we have served together for a good many years, I regret that the gentleman is making that decision, or that he has taken that decision, and want to wish him well in whatever he does once he leaves this puzzle factory. He has given a lot of good years of public service to the country, and I congratulate him for it.

Mr. Chairman, the moral purpose of government is supposed to be to maximize the possibility for each individual human being to reach his human potential. The economic purpose of government is supposed to be to establish policies and conditions which expand economic opportunities for American families to help them realize their fullest human potential. We are supposed to try to see to it that those opportunities are available to every human being simply based on his or her own humanness, not their income.

Yet in my judgment the decade of the 1980's has represented a flight both from responsibility and at the same time a flight from an abandonment of economic fairness.

In the actions of the government of the last 10 years, which have essentially doubled the military budget, we have a consequence of that and other actions taken in the budget cycles seen a real reduction in the investments that we make domestically. Not consumption programs domestically, but domestic investment programs.

We have seen those programs decline 30 percent in real dollar terms, and we have seen them as a percentage of the budget decline by almost 40 percent. I happen to think that is short-sighted and disastrous.

I would also say that the budget policies of the Reagan-Bush administrations of the last 10 years have effected an incredibly large transfer of wealth to the very richest people in this society.

Just a couple of examples: the real income for most families has been stagnant in the 1980's. In fact, average hourly earnings have declined. One of the major ways that families have tried to keep up with the cost of living has simply been to inject two workers from a family into the work force in order to overcome that decline in the average hourly earnings rate.

The richest 1 percent, in contrast to what has happened with the vast majority of families in this country, the richest 1 percent of people in this country have been on an incredible gravy train. The average income for the richest 1 million families in this country, the average income for the richest 1 percent of families in this country has grown from about $300,000 in 1980 to about $550,000 today. Forty percent of the total growth in personal income in this country during the 1980s went to the richest 1 percent of people in this country. It was greater than the combined growth in income of 90 percent of all American families.

If those richest 1 percent of American families had had their tax rates keep up with their income, from 1980 until today they would have paid $75 billion more into the Federal Treasury this year than they have paid, and our deficit would be half the size that it is today, and they would still have left a more steep increase in income than any other income group in this society.

A second shift that we have seen is that we have seen a shift of approximately $95 billion in financial responsibility from the Federal Government to State and local governments. That represents a tax shift to State and local tax sources such as the property tax of approximately $1,000 for every family in this country.

In the education area alone, we have had the Federal Government pull the plug on its traditional level of support for education as a percentage of national income. If the Federal Government was meeting the same degree of education costs that it was meeting 10 years ago, property taxes for education nationwide would be $10 billion lower.

Those are some important trends. Let me say the President's budget continues those trends, and I would suggest that this budget does about all it can to change those trends within the procedural trap that we find ourselves.

I think it is unfortunate that we are in the Gramm-Rudman sham we are because what is really going to happen is after all is said and done the administration will simply be able to reestimate our way into sequestration no matter what the Congress does. In my view, if the country really wants to avoid a budget resolution or a Federal budget which essentially uses the peace dividends to simply pay interest, what we are going to have, since the White House has become an inert object on fiscal integrity, we simply need to have the major interest groups in this country, organized labor, business people such as Lane Kirkland and Charlie Walker, to be personal about it, I think they are simply going to need to get together and talk to each other about what is it that we can fashion by way of a compromise in the private sector so that we can proceed further than this budget resolution does, because it is obvious we are not going to get that kind of support from the White House in being real.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, it is my privilege to yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BATEMAN], the ranking member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Armed Services.

Mr. BATEMAN. Mr. Chairman, as the ranking Republican member on the Subcommittee on Military Personnel and Compensation, I rise in opposition to the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1991, as reported from the Committee on the Budget. Among other deficiencies, it would have an unnecessarily draconian impact on the readiness and morale of our men and women in uniform.

We all recognize that force structure reductions are going to be made and, in fact, should be made in view of the changed threat environment. The President's budget submission indeed contemplates sizable reductions. The question is how quickly that drawdown can be accomplished without fracturing the force, and without gross inequities for our people in uniform.

Today we have the best quality military force in the Nation's history. Bright, young high school graduates find military service an attractive career path. They are proud to serve in the Nation's armed forces.

We have come a long way since the dark days of the late 1970's when the Navy had to tie up ships at the dock and over half of the Army's new recruits were high school dropouts in the lowest mental category eligible for enlistment. The turnaround has been dramatic, but make no mistake: that success is highly fragile. If we decide to cut the force too quickly, we may well plunge down that post-Vietnam precipice again.

Some of my colleagues seem to be blissfully unaware that the size of the force is already coming down significantly. Under President Bush's proposal, the Active Force will be cut by 91,000 between fiscal years 1989 and 1991. According to DOD estimates, passage of the resolution reported from the Budget Committee will mean a cut of an additional 100,000 active duty troops—in fiscal year 1991 alone. This figure could become much larger since the Budget Committee figure for budget outlay reduction in fiscal year 1991 may require the larger portion of the reductions to come from fast spending personnel accounts.

All of this will be magnified and utter chaos will result unless we swiftly and belatedly approve the too-long-pending DOD request to reprogram funds in the fiscal year 1990 budget to prevent outrageous hardship on military personnel.

Such cuts in 1 year will dramatically alter the character and profile of our force well into the future. Unlike the drawdown following earlier conflicts, we today have an All Volunteer Force—young men and women who came into the military with the expectation of making it a career. Even with a big cut in accessions or new recruits, a significant number of today's Volunteer Force will have their career expectation dashed through denial of reenlistment or involuntary separation. We should ask ourselves what will happen to 200,000 to 300,000 people now in uniform if they are forced out of the service. Some may say that they will find new employment in private industry. To those so naive, I would remind them that there will be thousands of civil service workers losing their DOD positions competing for private sector jobs, and in the context of hundreds of thousands of defense contractor employees who will likely be looking for new nondefense oriented jobs, the dislocation will be large, if not devastating. My colleagues, we are simply kidding ourselves if we think we can make huge cuts in manpower without both considerable pain and unfairness to the individuals involved and major disruption to military readiness, and to our economic stability. Another question we must ask and answer is how do we put back together in the future the military personnel with the intelligence, motivation, dedication, and training that an uncertain future may require, if we effect drastic unprogrammed reductions without regard to fairness and equity for those now in our armed services as volunteers.

I urge a "nay" vote on the Budget Committee's resolution.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA], the chairman on the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Chairman, I thank my distinguished colleague for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I will support this resolution, but I have some reservations.

Mr. Chairman, this budget resolution is a bitter pill for many of us to swallow.

I commend the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee and his colleagues for producing a comprehensive, fiscally responsible budget resolution in a timely manner. I know their job was not easy. I realize the choices made in this document reflect their best judgment on the future budget priorities of our Nation.

To their credit, I believe this budget resolution comes closer than any other in recent memory at being honest.

It's honest because it seeks to balance the Federal budget by the year 1995 without using the Social Security surplus to mask the true size of the deficit.

It is also honest because—at least in the outyears—it uses more realistic assumptions than the overly optimistic ones supplied by the Office of Management and Budget. Hopefully, this will provide more reliability to this budget plan than we have seen with its predecessors. Perhaps we can really reduce the Federal deficit without having it pop back up when warm and fuzzy assumptions become cold economic realities.

The 5-year reconciliation proposed in this budget resolution will enforce discipline on Congress to continue fiscal responsibility in the out-years and reduce the Federal deficit.

This budget resolution recognizes our Nation's need to increase our commitment toward education, infrastructure, competitiveness, crime, drugs and child care. More than $6 billion in new spending is proposed in these areas for fiscal 1991, going up to nearly $29 billion by fiscal 1995.

However, I must ask the question: Where is this money coming from?

Mr. Chairman, the answer is that a good size chunk of it is coming out of agricultural programs, plain and simple.

This budget resolution calls on the Agriculture Committee to reduce farm program spending by $900 million, 8.5 percent this year; $1.7 billion, 15 percent in fiscal 1992; and $2 billion each year thereafter.

In those out-years, we are talking about reducing farm program spending by about 20 percent a year. What other program is being asked to bear this large and disproportionate share of cut. This is a prescription for economic disaster for our Nation's farmers.

Farm program costs are less than 1 percent of the Federal budget. They are projected to decline to less than two-thirds of 1 percent by 1995. The actual costs of farm programs is projected to decline by 15 percent between 1992 and 1995.

Agriculture budget projections do not receive any adjustment for inflation that funding projection for appropriated programs and indexed entitlement programs receive, like food stamps and Social Security. In fact, the projected spending for one commodity program is based on an expected price support reduction of 15 percent from 1990 to 1995.

I agree with the need for new initiatives proposed in this budget resolution, but rural America has needs too.

Committee members are currently working on the development of a new viable crop insurance program that can provide our farmers with an acceptable risk management tool to deal with the weather-related disasters. Hopefully, it will avert the need for future ad hoc disaster legislation.

Committee members are working on new and innovative ways to further our Nation's conservation and environmental goals. We have pressing needs in the areas of rural economic development and food safety which we have or will soon address.

We expect to fund these new initiatives from within our existing allocation. We did not come to the well here to beg for money. All we have asked is that we be allowed to have enough funding to operate our Nation's vital farm programs effectively.

Since I became chairman in 1981, the Agriculture Committee has complied with each budget resolution and has done its part to help our Federal Government put its fiscal house in order.

We have reduced farm program spending authority by $33 billion over those years. We did that at the very time America's farmers went through some of the worst economic times rural America has faced since the 1930's.

Mr. Chairman, the easy thing would be for me to oppose this resolution. It is terribly unfair to our Nation's farmers. In the outyears, this budget resolution threatens to undermine the delicate recovery occurring in the agricultural economy.

But I will not oppose this budget resolution. I will swallow this bitter pill. This is an extremely difficult vote for me as I imagine it will be for many other Members who care about America's family farmers and ranchers.

I would ask my colleagues to remember agriculture's contributions to deficit reduction—past, present and future—as this resolution moves through the legislative process.

I hope an opportunity arises to ameliorate the treatment of agriculture under the budget. At the very least, I ask my colleagues to remember agriculture's contribution to deficit reduction when the Agriculture Committee brings the farm bill to the floor later this year.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS], chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding 10 minutes to me.

Mr. Chairman, we are about the most significant business that we can engage in in any particular legislative year, and that is the business of establishing our national budget, because how a nation spends its money is an important statement about a nation's priorities, and a nation's priorities in turn are significant statements about its values. Therefore, this is significant and important business, I would suggest too important, Mr. Chairman, for us to engage in hyperbole, but rather cogent, coherent, rational and intelligent assessment of the critical issues of our time as we attempt to arrive at a national set of priorities reflected in our national budget.

Mr. Chairman, the world has changed and continues to change in very powerful, profound, and bold fashion, in ways undreamed of just 6 months ago. The Berlin Wall has toppled, governments have toppled, not because of B-1 or B-2 bombers or Trident submarines or MX missiles, but rather the power of ideas.

□ 1820

The world has changed, Mr. Chairman, and we must change with it. A new consensus is now emerging. The moment dictates a new consensus. Therefore we should come to this moment intelligently, rationally, not with hyperbole. And when we enter into the process of establishing a new consensus, those of us who are attempting to be intellectually honest, from various ideological perspectives, must stand up and seize the time, seize the moment to engage in an honest discussion in order to frame the nature of this new consensus, a new budget for 1991.

With that as a backdrop, Mr. Chairman, it is with extraordinary pride that I rise to present the Congressional Black Caucus' quality-of-life budget for fiscal year 1991 to my colleagues.

It is a budget that is framed in competence, it is cogent, it is framed in integrity, rooted in compassion, our budget for fiscal year 1991.

Mr. Chairman, the CBC fiscal year 1991 budget offers an alternative vision of America by: First, enhancing existing social programs and creating new national initiatives; second, by providing for a national defense policy, and national security initiatives not rooted in obsolete policies of the cold war but the new, emerging realities of the world; and third, substantive progress in budget deficit reduction by rational economic policies and tax equity provisions.

Mr. Chairman, let me first start with our revenue package. We derive a total of $45.1 billion in new revenue. This is not smoke and mirrors, but real dollars. In general revenue, we derive $19.8 billion; in budget cuts, $25.3 billion; for a total of $45.1 billion.

How do we arrive at the $19.8 billion in new revenues, in general revenues? President Bush made the statement, "Watch my lips, no new taxes." But if you look at this fiscal 1991 budget, there is an interesting euphemism called new revenue options to the tune of $13.9 billion. Those of us in the Black Caucus looked at that $13.9 billion, we said based upon policy, principle, and integrity we must reject $5.7 billion of that. So we accepted $8.2 billion. We closed the so-called tax bubble because the wealthy pay at the marginal tax rate of 28 percent and we said most other people pay at the marginal tax rate of 33 percent; move them up. That gives us $4.1 billion additional.

We said let us place a 10 percent surtax on the top 10 percent of the corporations in this country. That gives us $6.5 billion additional.

Humphrey-Hawkins said, if you reduce the unemployment rate by one-tenth of 1 percent, you can assume new revenues of $1 billion additional.

Humphrey-Hawkins gives us an opportunity to derive $1 billion additional if you reduce the unemployment rate by one-tenth of 1 percent; $8.2 billion, $4.1 billion, $6.5 billion, and $1 billion, $19.8 billion in general revenue. How do we arrive at the additional $25.3 billion? We had a net cut in the military budget of $23.7 billion. I say net cut because we cut even more than that, Mr. Chairman, but we put nearly $3 billion back in economic conversion because America needs to move from heavy reliance on militarism toward a peacetime economy and we ought to offset the economic dislocations caused by base closures and weapons systems stoppages.

So we took and put $3 billion in to generate 150,000 jobs that will begin to move us down the road toward conversion. We put nearly $2 billion back into toxic waste cleanup because we think we have a responsibility to preserve the fragile nature of our ecological system. Our net was $23.7 billion outlay in the military budget.

We are presently spending at the rate of $306 billion. President Bush wants $303 billion. We say we can live with $279.3 billion. And that is an incredibly large military budget.

I might add, Mr. Chairman, when this gentleman came to Congress in January 1971, our military budget was $73 billion. When President Carter left office at the end of the decade of the 1970's, our military budget was $143 billion. We are now looking at military budgets in excess of $300 billion. In the short span of 20 years we have gone from $73 billion to over $300 billion.

We can take $23.7 billion from the military budget. I do not know if my colleagues know this or not, but we have spent on an annual basis between $150 billion and $160 billion per annum to maintain America's role in NATO. At minimum, the Warsaw Pact has been rendered impotent; at best it does not exist as a military entity. So who is the enemy in Europe?

The only thing that the West Germans have to fear from the East Germans is how fast the East Germans cross the line, Mr. Chairman.

Where is the war in Europe? If we can spend $160 billion per annum, we can cut $23.7 billion from the military budget. And anyone on this floor who assumes that there is going to be a worse case scenario, an attack from the Soviet Union, in my opinion is living in a bizzare and absurd world.

But there is a worst case scenario. The drug problem is a worst case scenario, homelessness is a worst case scenario, poverty a worst case scenario, 22 million Americans who are functionally illiterate. We are already at worst case scenarios in many places in this country, not some hypothetical enemy that does not exist at a time when peace needs to break out in the world.

We cut $1.4 billion from science and technology budget because $1.4 billion is related to warmaking. We cut $200 million from our military credit sales, for a total of $45.1 billion.

We reduced the national deficit by meeting Gramm-Rudman targets. We reduce the deficit in fiscal year 1991 to $63.7 billion. In our outyear projections we meet Gramm-Rudman in fiscal 1992 and in fiscal 1993 we give America a $5 billion surplus.

We give it back to America by fiscal 1993, given the tax provisions and the budget cut assumptions of the Congressional Black Caucus.

We meet our statutory responsibility. What do we do with the other money? Mr. Chairman, we take $33.2 billion and put it in nonmilitary programs, $33.2 billion more than the President. We put it in agriculture, $1.5 billion; we put it in education, nearly $5 billion; we put it in housing, we put it in preserving the nature of our ecological system; we put it in fighting drugs, we put it in enhancing education and job training. We said if there is going to be a so-called peace dividend, let us return it to those people who suffered the pain of an extraordinary increase in the military budget during the decade of the 1980's, when we were moving from $143 billion to in excess of $300 billion per annum.

Mr. Chairman, we have done an extraordinary job. The 24 members of the Black Caucus came together and we, as I said earlier, developed a budget rooted in competence, based on compassion and whose integrity, in my humble opinion, is complete.

Let us have an honest debate on the floor of Congress. I do not think anyone can rationally debate that the world would come to an end if you cut $23.7 billion in outlays from the military budget; $279 billion is an extraordinary amount of money.

We need to get on with the business of dealing with other major problems in this country. I think this debate is important. I think this debate is significant. This is a most important and significant thing we do.

So let us have at it. An emerging new consensus, I believe, will march us off in the direction toward peace, toward a healthy economy in this country and toward a budget that we can all be proud of. And I thank my distinguished colleague for his generosity.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I do hope we can have an exchange that does reflect approximately 5 minutes on each side. I know there is difficulty in this process when we have people who have not just a lot to say but who say it so very well. I must say that I am having difficulty constraining myself from my colleague from California, such a good friend, and we agree on almost everything when we are in the gym together, but I do not always agree with his conclusions on the floor. I must say that I think it is probably OK in his district to have $43 billion of new taxes, and it probably is not in mine. However, I do not want to take a lot more time on that.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly to me?

Mr. LEWIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from California, although my people will be unhappy with me, but surely I will yield.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and simply say that I know the gentleman did not seek to misspeak himself, but I said $45 billion in total revenue, $19.8 billion in general revenue. I specifically outlined the nature of the revenue. It was not $45 billion in taxes. I do love the gentleman, and I think he did not seek to distort the nature of this gentleman's comments, but I wanted to clarify that.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Once again, in my district, when we take revenue from the folks some way, it is called taxes; in your district it may not be.

Nonetheless, in the meantime, one of our colleagues feels very strongly that in a changing world of which we speak, we should indeed see this opportunity crystallized, and we have a peace dividend. The gentleman who I think is best prepared to speak upon returning that peace dividend to the rightful owners is the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUECHNER], and I yield 5 minutes to that gentleman.

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California for yielding time to me.

I relish the opportunity to follow on the heels of our eloquent and esteemed colleague from California who brought out the Congressional Black Caucus' budget, but he made some very interesting points. He said that the people who paid the pain of fighting the cold war should reap some of the benefits. I think if there was any person that paid for the cold war, it was the American taxpayer. That was the investment that the American taxpayer made that ended up bringing about peace. Mikhail Gorbachev, the Russian Politburo, the leadership of the Soviet Army are not benign tinkerers. They are very, very astute poker players. The reason that they have begun to fold their hand is not because a group of people in the next room chanted, it was because the United States, at a table, said, "We are prepared to defend the Free World."

The Soviet Union finally, because it was unable to provide guns and butter said that they would begin to fold. Now, they have not folded yet, but they are sweating. They are pacing around, and they are drinking a lot of vodka.

But the United States, if there is a peace dividend, ought to understand who paid the original investment, who made the ability of the United States armed services to be so strong, so prepared, so technically ready, that the Soviets are now walking away from the table. I am not prepared to admit that the people who for the last 10 years have said that there is no possible Soviet threat, I am not prepared to admit that they are right, I am prepared to admit that times they are a changin'. However, if one just simply looks at Lithuania and understands that those are the Soviet armored cars rolling down those streets, those are the Soviet soldiers taking over various printing presses and government officers there, that this is not the Pollyanna world that a lot of Americans and Members of this Congress would like it to be. There still is a threat.

Mr. Chairman, let Members for a moment say this threat is diminished significantly and that there is a peace dividend. Should we do, as either the Congressional Black Caucus wants to do, raise taxes and create a whole new plethora of social problems; or as the Democratic alternative, the rebuild America, which also brings in a whole lot of new programs, is that what we should do? Or should we give the money back to the people that made the original investment? I offered a sense of the Congress yesterday to the Committee on Rules that said if there is a peace dividend and we reduce the deficit and meet the Gramm-Rudman target, is it not the right thing to do, to give the money back to the original investors? Should we not give it back to the taxpayer? If they want day care, let them pay for day care. If they want to have research and development, let them invest in research and development. If they want to improve the quality of the schools, give them the money so they can support local tax increases at the school level. Why is it that the people up here in Washington who have been celebrating for so long to get their hands on more tax dollars so they can jam it into their priorities—not the priorities of the people back home, but their priorities—why is it that we should control that instead of the people that made the investment? The Committee on Rules did not make my amendment and my sense-of-the-Congress amendment in order, but sure as we sit in this U.S. Congress, we must realize that we are not the deliverers of all good knowledge, that there are a lot of people out there with families who would like to have the opportunity to benefit from the peace dividend, but they would like to make the decisions. Is that not the American way? Is that not the sensible way?

Mr. Chairman, the Democratic budget says they would like to rebuild America, but if all they want to do is take our tax dollars and jam it into their new social programs, they are not rebuilding America, they are "rebulling" America.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 90 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON] for the purpose of debate on economic goals and policies, and I ask that the gentleman be entitled to yield time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 90 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Budget, and I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased, as the chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, to participate in the debate on economic goals. We undertake this debate because of the efforts of my distinguished colleague, GUS HAWKINS. It was, of course, he and his colleagues in the Senate, the late Hubert and Muriel Humphrey, who framed institutions to focus not only on the dollars and cents of the budget, but on what we are really trying to achieve with these dollars and cents.

We are here to debate a massive document and a complex issue. We will refer to numbers of dollars that are beyond the experience or even the comprehension of most Americans. And yet it we focus on what the budget is trying to do, in the spirit of GUS HAWKINS, its essence is concepts that everyone understands—prudence, fairness, and leadership. If we keep our eyes on these concepts, we will see the right course, and we will serve the people well. If we do not, we may squander our birthright as Americans.

ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

In many respects the economy has performed well over the last 7 years—with a prolonged expansion, low unemployment, and moderate inflation. Some Members of Congress may find it difficult to persuade ourselves, and the public, that we must make the tough choices to address the budget problems. I find, however, that my constituents and people from all around the country are deeply concerned about our economy. They are not in a state of panic, and they do not fear a depression or a runaway inflation. Rather, they sense a steady slowing of our advancement. They are frustrated to see our standard of living and our productivity stagnating, with little or no wage growth and increasing pay inequity for so many American workers. They are disturbed about our declining ability to compete with West Germany, Japan, and other leading industrial nations, and with our shrinking technological edge. They are troubled that we buy more than we sell around the world, and that we have dissipated our investment balance with other nations and have become the world's largest debtor.

While the American people do not have the trained perspective of economists, they understand instinctively that the budget deficit is a source of important weaknesses in our economy. Accordingly, they want decisive action. They want a change in our economic policy to reverse our trend toward debt, to encourage saving, to educate and train a world-class work force, and te reestablish our economic vigor and our preeminent role in the world.

In my judgment, the American people will be disappointed with the administration's budget, and with the budget resolution we consider today. Neither meets the high responsibility that the Federal Government bears toward this Nation. Neither makes the tough choices necessary to resolve our fiscal imbalance.

Let me try to explain why the American people are concerned, and why we should be concerned, about the Federal budget deficit.

First, our budgets over the last 10 years have been imprudent toward the long-term strength of our economy. The Joint Economic Committee recently issued its annual report, with bipartisan agreement, recognizing these concerns.

SAVING

We need more saving to finance investment to make us competitive in world markets, and to provide the standard of living we want for ourselves and our children. National saving in excess of depreciation in the late 1980's is only one-third of what it was in the high-employment years of the 1970's.

The major single source of the decline in domestic saving has been the extraordinary Federal budget deficit. Even including the growing saving in the Social Security trust fund, the budget deficit in the late 1980's syphoned off more than 60 percent of our net saving—more than three times as much as in the high-employment years of the 1970's

INVESTMENT

The budget deficit has distorted our use of the savings pool. It has kept interest rates high, and thereby biased business decision toward the short term. With business investment concentrated on short-lived assets that wear out or become obsolete quickly, we have needed to invest more just for replacement; and investment over and above what is needed for replacement is now one-fifth lower as a percentage of GNP than it was at the end of the 1970's. The deficit also has driven the dollar higher, making U.S. products less competitive, and discouraging investment in manufacturing.

The budget deficit has restrained public investment as well, because investment can seem easy to postpone. Last summer, 327 economists, including 6 Noble Prize winners, presented a letter to the JEC that stated:

In addition to our trade and fiscal deficits, America faces a "third deficit"—the deficiency of public investment in our people and our economic infrastructure. This deficit will have a crippling effect on America's future competitiveness.

Although economists may disagree about the precise cause of the slowing of productivity growth since the late 1960s and early 1970's, they do agree that productivity increases when we raise our investment, to equip our workers with more and better factories, machines, technology, and public infrastructure. And they do agree that the key to raising our standard of living and our children's is raising productivity.

DEPENDENCE

The deficit and its drain on domestic saving has made us dependent on foreign capital to finance our domestic investment. Private investment during the 1980's war largely financed by unprecedented inflows of capital from abroad; our economy in building on a foundation of borrowed money. These capital inflows have accumulated to an international debt projected to reach $2 trillion by the end of the century. This debt gives our foreign creditors a large influence over our exchange rates and interest rates. A decline in their confidence could raise interest rates further and choke domestic investment.

Second, our budgets over the last 10 years have contributed to growing unfairness in America.

Economic mobility—where anyone willing to work hard could achieve a decent and rising standard of living—is much less evident for the average working American today. Wages have stagnated throughout the 1980's; family incomes have grown modestly only because more family members have worked more hours. Income inequality has now reached its highest level since we began collecting such statistics in 1947—a sharp reversal of the historic trend toward more equality during expansions. And the tax system has become less fair, with the tax burden on the lowest-income families increasing, and that on the highest-income families decreasing—in large part because of our growing reliance on payroll taxes.

The deficit has hindered our ability to tackle this problem. We must make room in the budget for effectively targeted human investment and a more humanitarian policy toward our least advantaged, while also achieving the deficit reduction that will reduce real interest rates and encourage private investment, rising productivity, and wage growth for all Americans.

Third, through our budgetary behavior, our leadership around the world and here at home has eroded.

Twenty-five years ago, our position of leadership was secured by defense capabilities and sheer economic size. Today, we are unquestionably still the world leader. But there are signs that our position has begun to erode because our fiscal house is not in order. We cannot be the leader in setting the rules for the international economy when other nations are our creditors, and can point to our fiscal profligacy—with the support of international organizations like the International Monetary Fund and the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. Most recently, Japan has defended its trade barriers on the ground that our trade deficit is caused by our large budget deficit. Meanwhile, in our search for resources to aid East bloc economies—particularly Poland and Romania—to make a smooth transition to a free market system, we shift funds from other needy areas. Wide fluctuations in the dollar also weaken our international role. We must recognize the close relationship between our domestic policies and our position in the world.

And we must see just as clearly the effect of our budgetary policies on the people's respect for government here at home. Of all of the costs of our years of large deficits and smoke-and-mirrors budgeting, perhaps the greatest is the loss of public trust. The American people see that year after year we claim to meet deficit targets, only to flaunt those targets with accounting gimmicks and phoney savings. The fact is that most of the American people will not believe in any budgetary plan we pass today.

And that cynicism, while unfortunate, has a strong grounding in fact. In fiscal year 1987, the deficit was $150 billion. In fiscal year 1988, the deficit was $155 billion. In fiscal year 1989, the deficit was $152 billion. In the current fiscal year 1990, the deficit is now projected at about $160 billion. The deficit is not coming down. And yet, all the while, we have met the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction targets, and we have congratulated ourselves publicly on our achievements. We have seduced ourselves with our declining projections, while the actual deficit rumbles soberly along. The public is acutely aware of our obliviousness to reality; and in my judgment, both the administration's budget and our resolution will only feed the popular cynicism that makes governance so difficult.

OUTLINES OF A SOLUTION

There is no formula and no procedure that will solve our deficit problem. We need to devise a substantive solution, and summon the political will to enact it. In my judgment, the ultimate solution must be a balanced package of spending cuts for lower priority functions and moderate tax increases. In broad outline, here is what such a package would require.

First, we need a prudent and realistic economic forecast, so that we have an accurate measure of the size of the problem.

Budget estimates that command public respect are a part of the process.

Second, we need an ultimate deficit target that addreses our Nation's need for both savings and public investment.

The major economic cost of the deficit is its drain on our Nation's savings and investment. Therefore, we need to reduce the deficit enough to increase national savings and private investment, without starving the Federal sector of funds needed for public investment in key areas, and without our current dependence on foreign savings. One is public infrastructure. Beyond concrete for highways and computers for air traffic control, we need carefully planned support for advanced technology, as noted in the JEC Annual Report. And we need to invest in our people—from infant nutrition and child care to effective educational standards and teacher background, and job skills for the disadvantaged, immigrants and those displaced by changes in technology and trade.

Third, we need a schedule of annual deficit reduction that is neither too tight nor too loose.

A deficit reduction schedule that is too rigorous will lead to smoke-and-mirrors trickery, and those games increase spending and hurt our economy in the long run. It may even cause a recession immediately. But a schedule that asks too little will allow our debt to mount, and further erode our economic strength.

Fourth, we need credibility with the public at large and with the financial markets.

The deficit is fundamentally a long-term problem—eroding our savings and our investment for the future. Therefore, we need a long-term solution. This means actual deficit reduction, rather than revenues borrowed from future fiscal years and expenditures bunted backward and forward to achieve cosmetic success in one particular year.

Long-term policies—especially those that entail some cost—are a test of the Government's credibility. I believe that the American people know instinctively that our economic course is wrong; they know that we must pay our bills as a society. Therefore, they will accept—in fact, I believe that they want and expect—decisive action to get our economy moving again. They are prepared for a deficit reduction program, provided that it is credible. Our problem is that we have played our budget games for so long—with all of the best intentions, to be sure—that we have no credibility left.

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

The President's budget merely tinkers around the edges of our needs for deficit reduction and public investment. The budget is marred by what I would call "The Seven Deadly Sins of Budgeting."

The first is the smoke of overly optimistic economic assumptions. Richard Darman testified before the JEC that events through early March could add as much as $15 billion to the administration's January estimate of the fiscal year 1991 deficit. More recently, he has raised that figure to as high as $20 billion. The administration's long-term forecast of rapid real growth and falling interest rates has the tantalizing result that the deficit melts away just over the horizon. However, wishing will not make it happen, and there is not much more than wishes in the administration's policy.

Second, deficit reductions are exaggerated, as if magnified in a fun-house mirror—like the defense "management reforms". Third, penny-wise and pound-foolish policies make cuts whose ill effects outweigh the budget savings, and there are sins of omission where current services funding is just not enough—like the failure to provide adequate resources for infrastructure, or aid to Eastern Europe. Fourth, pass-the-buck policies shift burdens to other levels of government—like mandated cost savings under Medicaid, and reductions in grants for sewage treatment and public housing modernization; fifth, cut-now-pay-later policies shift the problem in time, putting it off for another day—like the capital gains tax cut; and sixth, shell games shift expenses off budget or conceal them in an accounting maze—like ending indirect subsidies to the Postal Service. Finally, a sizable number of the administration's proposals have been submitted before and failed to achieve political support on either side of the aisle—like cuts of Amtrak subsidies, or Social Security payroll taxation of State and local government employees. We have not yet received the estimate we requested from OMB of the dollar total of such proposed deficit reductions; we put the amount at almost $10 billion.

Because of the President's "no new taxes" pledge, temporizing has been the standard budgeting procedure. The major source of our budgetary problems is lack of leadership from the President to move us forward in constructng an acceptable, comprehensive package. The problem is worsened by an unbalanced Gramm-Rudman process that has outlived its usefulness; it now just invites smoke and mirrors budgeting.

The budget resolution before us today does a better job than the administrations budget in addressing the Nation's needs. Gone are such political nonstarters as no Economic Development Administration money or Amtrak subsidies; Medicaid and sewage treatment politices that would dump the burdens on the States; and unrealistic or unwisely large savings in programs ranging from school lunches to agriculture, Medicare, and Federal employee compensation.

Unlike the administration's budget, the resolution provides net additional resources for high-priority public investments; in technology; for children; in health, nutrition, and housing; in human security; in infrastructure and the environment; and in democracy and development in eastern Europe and the Third World. It includes the House-passed child care legislation, and moderate and realistic human capital investments from prenatal care and maternal nutrition to Head Start and other education. It includes training funds, which will help those affected by the defense cutback as well as trade and other changes in the economy. It encompasses public investment in technology—such as the critical science and research activities of the National Science Foundation—as well as public investment infrastructure and the environment—highways, aviation, Superfund and EPA. Funding for Medicaid, food stamps, rural housing, and the war on drugs take a humanitarian posture in distributing the gains of a healthier economy.

There are funds in the resolution to address more adequately the needs of foreign nations making fragile progress toward democratic and economic reforms. We cannot permit democratic governments to fall or allow other developed nations to preempt our key economic relationships with the emerging economies of Latin America and Eastern Europe.

These accomplishments in the budget resolution do not come easily. There will be a price to pay. In regard to taxes, and to the deficit reduction from entitlements as well, the Budget Committee has written multiyear reconciliation instructions into the resolution. For revenues, these instructions require not only the same amount of net additional revenues in fiscal year 1991 as the Bush budget, but also that these revenue gains be sustained over future years. Too often in the past, multiyear plans have been enacted merely to cover over a lack of action in the budget year with vague good intentions. But long-term budgeting with firm instructions, if those instructions are upheld in future fiscal years, can avoid the sin of cutting revenues now, and paying later.

Long-term planning also plays a crucial role in this budget resolution's handling of defense. Witnesses before the JEC have cautioned that any truly sizable peace dividend will be several years in coming. An emphasis on quick savings will leave us with a weakened defense establishment and will waste money in the long run. The budget resolution before us makes a prudent reduction in defense outlays from the current services baseline; and it makes substantially larger reductions in budget authority. The outlay savings are achievable without damaging readiness, if we distribute them wisely. The reductions in budget authority will prevent contractual commitments that lock us into future spending, if we stick to our resolve in future fiscal years. It will still be possible to add spending authority later if international developments take a disappointing turn.

Having said what is right about the budget resolution, I must mention some things that are wrong; while the administration broke new ground in its commission of the seven deadly sins of budgeting, the resolution is not free of guilt. First, the resolution starts with the administration's economic and technical assumptions; it blows the budget's second-hand smoke. Though the resolution makes some gestures toward reality, the first year's forecast is far too close to the administration's. We, ourselves, do not believe those numbers to be prudent; if we do not believe in the budget numbers, how can we expect the public to have confidence in the policies that we are pursuing?

Of course, part of the problem rests with the Gramm-Rudman process, which gives the administration the power to set the assumptions that can trigger sequestration. Under these circumstances, it is natural for the Congress to adopt the administration's assumptions, because they always allow reaching the Gramm-Rudman deficit target with less pain. Indeed, it is politically perilous to be the bearer of the bad news that the administration so publicly denies.

But once they stop denying the bad news, as they did in the midsession review last summer and as they seem to be doing now for political advantage, then we in the Congress will be confronted with the need for tens of billions of dollars of additional deficit reduction. This will extract a heavy cost in terms of credibility from a Congress that declares victory in this resolution; we will have to tell the American people, yet another time, that the actual deficit will bear not the least resemblance to the number we claimed in our congressional budget. Instead, we must acknowledge now that there are great uncertainties surrounding the level of the fiscal year 1991 budget deficit. We should confess that it is likely to be well above the $64 billion Gramm-Rudman target—but we should refuse to assign magical properties to that target. What is important is solid deficit reduction. Without it, there is no question that our deficit will be too large.

Furthermore, the deficit reduction in the budget resolution is smaller than I would prefer, discounting the highly uncertain components—those dependent on the effectiveness of administrative actions in collecting revenues, selling assets, and so on. Along with the President's smoke, we have borrowed his mirrors. Insufficient deficit reduction will allow our debt to mount, starve our economy of needed saving and investment, and complicate our economic relations with the rest of the world.

There is no magic number for deficit reduction that is blessed by a consensus of respected economists. But proceeding at the pace in this resolution—about $25 billion per year, net of new initiatives and administrative savings and if all the instructions in the resolution are carried out—would take far too long to achieve the domestic saving and investment performance of the 1960's. With this resolution, we have not achieved enough deficit reduction to be credible with the American people and with financiers around the world.

CONCLUSION

This resolution is an improvement on the administration's budget. The resolution's economic assumptions are slightly more realistic than the administration's. The defense figures in the resolution are better than of the administration's, though still short of the new geopolitical reality. The nondefense outlays include fewer of the fanciful cuts in the administration's budget, and use some of the proceeds of the defense build-down to make prudent—indeed, essential—investments in infrastructure, people, and knowledge. The revenue instructions include no overstated management reforms, and require that the revenues be solid policy changes rather than timing shifts from one year to another.

This resolution is a solid achievement of the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee, Mr. PANETTA, and I commend him for it. It is hard to imagine that anyone could have done a better job, under the circumstances.

But from my perspective, even granting Mr. PANETTA's achievement in formulating the resolution, superiority over the administration's budget is not an adequate test. We are left with the question of whether the resolution is good enough—whether it meets our obligations to the country, to our constituents who are waiting for decisive action against the deficit. This is a judgment call that every Member must make, and I do not begrudge any other Member his independent judgment, but I must exercise mine.

We have labored for the last decade without responsible Presidential leadership, or leadership from Congress, on fiscal policy. Over that decade, as we have accumulated a mountain of debt, the budget submissions have turned a blind eye to the problem. Even worse, Presidents have engaged in governance by slogan, which has made addressing the problem more difficult. Chairman PANETTA and his distinguished colleagues on the Budget Committee were constrained by the lack of Presidential leadership, and as a result, had to rely on essentially the same imprudent and overly optimistic economic assumptions, and on the same unrealistic administrative savings, that were used in the President's budget.

The result is that this resolution, although an improvement over the President's budget, does not meet our obligations to the Nation.

The ultimate danger here is that the unrealism of our economic assumptions—though they are improved over the administration's—and the optimistic estimates of administrative savings—though the other deficit reduction action is far more solid than the administration's—will once more violate the responsibility of this Congress to get our fiscal house in order. Our reserves of credibility are already far too low. We have not done what we know ought to be done.

Accordingly, with all respect to the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee and his colleagues, I will vote "no" on this resolution.

CONCLUSION—GUS HAWKINS

As I mentioned earlier, my colleague on the Joint Economic Committee, GUS HAWKINS, shaped the legislation which brings us to the floor at this point in the budget process to debate our economic goals. The Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act of 1978, or the Humphrey-Hawkins bill, is often referred to as a "jobs bill." But to GUS HAWKINS, it has always been more of an economic statement. For him, jobs and education are vital components of economic policy.

He recognized in 1978, for example, that the economy could suffer severe structural unemployment and waste of human potential in the long run if we did not provide education and job training for the disadvantaged. A decade later, U.S. employers are finding that our labor force is unprepared for the modern workplace, and the shortage of adequately skilled workers threatens our competitiveness in the international marketplace—just as GUS HAWKINS said it would.

GUS HAWKINS has spent most of his life pursuing improved educational and job training opportunities for the disadvantaged. He framed these issues in terms of fairness and decency, but also smart economics. A little known fact about my distinguished colleague is that he holds a degree in economics. GUS HAWKINS has always believed that the Federal Government plays a vital role in ensuring the economic health of the Nation; and that appropriate public policies should combine fairness and justice with economic growth and prosperity.

From this perspective, he sees the Federal budget as far more than just a financial statement. It as part of the Government's economic game plan—a blueprint of our goals, our priorities, and our vision of the future.

GUS HAWKINS once described a leader as someone who works "day in and day out for the practical realization of a better world." This is the standard he set. And this, I believe, is the standard he has met, again and again, during 56 years of public service.

It is my hope that the continuation of these Humphrey-Hawkins debates, managed by the Joint Economic Committee as part of the annual budget process, will be a lasting tribute to GUS HAWKINS' dedication to economic policy in service of every American.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY], and in turn, he will yield a portion of his time to at least one other Member who is involved in this session of our proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS], who is a stalwart on what we are about to talk about.

Mr. Chairman, these days, as more and more of our colleagues become more and more frustrated with America's expanding trade deficit, I seem to hear more and more on this floor about measures like increasing import tariffs, restricting American markets, and retaliating to Japanese protectionism.

I can't help but be reminded of those frustrated jockeys in a horse race, who, coming in second or third, blame the other jockeys for cheating, the gate for sticking, the track for rough spots, the weather for imperfection and generally everybody and everything except themselves and their horse.

Well, all those things might be true or they might not. In either case there is really no substitute, when you're in a horse race, for having a well groomed, healthy, fast horse and a skilled competent jockey.

Now, to stretch this metaphor just a little bit further, we can think of the international marketplace as a horse race. There's no question that the American economy has all of the horsepower it needs and more; it is government, the jockey, that seems to be having trouble hanging on. Not only that, but we'd better start worrying seriously just how we groom and feed our economic racehorse, or it won't matter whether the Japanese jockey is cheating on the straightaway or not.

So, Mr. Chairman, that is why I am joining today with two Members who have distinguished themselves with leadership in the area of American competitiveness to bring to our colleagues' attention a package of 12 bills that will go a long way toward grooming American competitiveness to top racing form.

Mr. Chairman, let me run quickly through these bills after which my distinguished colleague, Mr. RITTER, will address them in more detail.

Here are some of our proposals.

First, the permanent restoration of the research and development tax credit. It's time we told American firms that the beneficial tax consequences of long range R&D investments will be assured.

Another proposal encourages investment in startup companies by rewarding the engineers, risk-takers, and investors who give up the security of working for established companies for the challenge of creating tomorrow's Fortune 500 firms.

Next, a permanent cut in the capital gains rate is an essential step toward making our country more competitive. Additionally, this proposal would encourage the long term holding of property.

We've also found a way to encourage investments in manufacturing. This proposal is important because our share of the worldwide market in manufactured goods has declined significantly during the last few decades. This proposal would create an incentive for individuals to invest in domestic firms that make and sell manufactured goods.

To increase national savings and create an incentive for individuals to invest in growth companies, we propose a tax exemption of $2,500 a year for interest and dividend income. This will give all Americans an opportunity to participate in making our economic future prosperous.

We also need to help American firms compete in high-definition television, semiconductors, medical research and in a host of other areas with inordinate market risks and large capital costs. Current American antitrust laws stand as obstacles. Our proposal changes that.

Another obstacle to investment in new products and technologies is the risk of having American ideas pirated in another country. Our bill would make it easier to exclude goods that violate our intellectual property laws.

We also propose a tax incentive for companies to lend their employees to schools and colleges to assist in teaching students and preparing course materials.

Finally, our proposal takes a good lick at reforming our liability laws. The American people are sick and tired of seeing the costs of professional services skyrocket because of the growth and uncertainty in court awards.

Mr. Chairman, all these proposals have two things in common: First, they are geared toward inducing more capital formation in the United States; and second, they strive to allow American enterprise to focus on more long-term horizons without incurring insupportable costs in the short run.

I commend my colleagues from California and Pennsylvania for the tremendous leadership they have shown in working to develop these ways to strengthen American competitiveness.

Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITTER].

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY] for his excellent statement, and what we are really about in our task force on technology and policy is to try and set a climate for doing here in America for ourselves in this great race that the gentleman from Texas talked about, for doing here in America for ourselves in this great race far more when it comes to the production of value added goods and services, the likes of which are first in the global marketplace.

Mr. Chairman, now we are talking about climate for savings, climate for investment, the legal climate, the research and development and the evolution of technology climate, and some of the bills that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY] mentioned I would like to go into in a little more detail.

First of all, the permanent restoration of the research and development tax credit. Not only do we think it is important to have this as a long-term incentive for firms to invest in R&D, but we also think and such that they are not looking from 1 year to the next to see what the tax laws are going to be, but also to expand this definition to a wider range of companies producing goods and service in the United States. It is a pro-research and development tax credit bill for manufacturing and for high technology. We want to encourage investment in startup companies that are focused on manufacturing.

As my colleagues know, for three or four decades Americans lost touch with the idea that the central producer of wealth and value was things that people produced, goods that sold in the United States and all over the world. We even had complex philosophies put forth by people like Nesbit and Tuffler telling us how we were in an information age, and information really did not depend on basic industries and that there was no real need to have these things, these basic industries, located in the United States. All we had to do was have the electronic gear here to transfer information, and this is extraordinarily far from the reality that has come home to all of us as we see the economic miracle of Japan where they are making things of higher quality, better year, after year, after year and has really provided a central driving force for their preeminence in the global marketplace in the fields of manufacturing. So, we make it easier for people to leave established firms and incorporate and gain in new manufacturing ventures by having a 50-percent capital gains exclusion for investments of 2 years and longer.

The greatest ace in the hole of the United States of America is our startup companies. Let us give them a boost. Let us give them the ability to survive so they do not have to sell out to other larger companies right away, or foreign companies.

We talked about a capital gains reduction that seeks to bring patient capital to the American enterprise. So many of today's key products in the world market are the result of 5, 10, and 15 years of effort on the part of companies and nations. We need to have the kind of long-term, hang-in-there investments that are similar.

We talk about a tax credit for manufacturing equipment. Let us bring back an investment tax credit. After we took away accelerated depreciation in the ITC in the 1986 reform, we saw the gap between the cost of capital in the United States and Japan yawn. We need to change that around.

Mr. Chairman, let me make one last comment on promoting savings.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY] has expired.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield an additional 2 minutes?

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania 2 additional minutes.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Chairman, only in America do we tax earnings twice. We tax it at the corporate level, and then we tax individuals that have dividends or interest.

Now, what we propose is a $2,500 tax-free dividend or interest accumulation. This will spur savings. This will spur investment because the broad population in this country has become somewhat disenchanted with stocks, with certain kinds of investment, particularly high risk investments. It is necessary to have that kind of incentive.

I will close with a word on another thing that only happens in America. Only in America is litigation perhaps the biggest of our growth industries. Only in America do we have a tendency to resort to court actions, whether it is in business dealings, or in liability for products or liability for professions. We tend to address our disputes almost immediately in the courts to an extent unkown worldwide. We propose reform in liability of products. We propose reform for liability of professionals. We propose reform for liability of stock offerings, and we feel this combination gives us the chance, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DELAY] said, to run down that long race with our maximum potential and maximum speed.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I am going to yield the balance of my time for controllers on our side to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. DOUGLAS].

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. DOUGLAS] may control the time.

There was no objection.

□ 1910

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCURDY], and I ask unanimous consent that he may control that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HASTERT], with whom I serve on the Committee on Government Operations, who has been a leader in the fight against government waste and also wants to help empower our senior citizens with the right to earn in their senior years.

Mr. HASTERT. Mr. Chairman, America is known throughout the world as the land of opportunity. A place where a person can work hard and freely use his talents and ability to make a better life for himself and his children. But for one certain group in our society, that promise is conditional. For our older American workers who choose to remain productive in order to improve their standard of living, they find the Government takes the vast bulk of their additional wages through a special tax that applies only to them.

Of all the taxes the Federal Government imposes on senior citizens, the most insidious and counterproductive is the Social Security earnings test.

WHAT IS THE EARNINGS TEST?

The earnings test is a limit placed on seniors who continue to work after they retire and begin to collect their Social Secuirty benefits. For 1990, that limit is $9,360 dollars.

For seniors over the age of 65, the penalty for earning more than $9,360 is a $1 loss in Social Security benefits for every $3 over the limit earned. It should be noted that only earned income is counted when determining the earnings test. Non-earned income, such as pensions, investment income, interest income, or income from capital gains, is not counted in this determination. The earnings limit only penalizes those who work.

WHO IS AFFECTED BY THE EARNINGS TEST?

The earnings limit affects many seniors in many different ways. One senior may need to work because Social Security cannot cover the high cost of medical care. Another senior may need to work because her work history was too short and therefore her benefit check is small. Other seniors want to continue to be productive while at the same time retired. For example, a former machinist of a tool and die shop may want to retire but still work part-time because there is such a demand for his talents. Many seniors just cannot afford to live on a Social Security benefit check alone.

For whatever reason a senior chooses to stay in the work force, he will face an excessive penalty once the amount he earns is above the $9,360 limit.

When combined with other taxes a senior is forced to pay, the earnings limit penalty puts that senior at a 56 percent effective marginal tax rate—twice the rate we ask millionaires to pay! For a senior working at a job that pays $5 per hour, he will only take home $2.20 an hour after his earnings go above the $9,360 limit.

The penalty is even worse for someone whose spouse collects a check as a dependent. Not only is the senior penalized $1 for every $3 over the limit he earns, his wife's check is penalized the same amount, or if she is under 65, $1 for every $2 over the penalty. That means a man with a 64-year-old wife would lose $5 out of the $6 he earned over the $9,360 limit.

WHAT WOULD THE OLDER AMERICANS' FREEDOM TO WORK ACT DO?

Because of the significant economic opportunities made possible by repeal of the earnings limit, H.R. 2460, the Older Americans' Freedom To Work Act, has been incorporated into the American Economic Opportunity Act.

H.R. 2460 repeals the Social Security earnings limit for persons over the age of 65. In effect, my bill lowers the exempt age from 70 to 65 years of age, allowing the senior to earn as much as he is capable of earning.

No one should be dependent upon the Federal Government in their everyday lives. H.R. 2460 would give working seniors the opportunity to control their own lives, limited only by their own ambitions to work and save.

WHO BENEFITS FROM REPEAL?

Most obviously, the older workers of America benefit once the earnings limit is repealed. Specifically, two-thirds of those who benefit from repeal are seniors who have been low to middle income wage earners throughout their working lives. A middle-class senior will need to work to supplement their Social Security check.

Another group which would benefit from repeal is the small business owner. As you know, the labor pool is shrinking. Small businesses are having an especially tough time hiring experienced, willing, and dependable workers. The earnings limit was established during the Depression to force older workers out of the work force, creating job opportunities for younger workers. In this day and age, it is ridiculous to have a tax policy determining whether people will be productive.

Many businesses have contacted me wanting the earnings limit repealed so that they can retain their experienced workers. In our society, some of the most skilled and work-oriented people are those approaching 65 and over. Some of the most prized employees in this Nation are those who know the value of a hard day's work.

The economy as a whole would benefit from repeal of the earnings limit. It is estimated that the Government would collect $4.9 billion in additional taxes which would result in a $140 million net increase in Federal revenues.

The effects of eliminating the earnings limit are difficult to predict because so much of a senior's income now is part of the "underground" economy. However, a study done by the National Center for Policy Analysis, estimates that without an earnings limit 700,000 seniors would enter the labor market. As a result, our annual output of goods and services would increase by at least $15.4 billion.

As you can see, eliminating the earnings limit for retired workers makes good economic sense. It would bring in additional tax dollars and contribute to the overall output of goods and services.

Beyond that, the earnings limit is just plain unfair. Why should one group be penalized for wanting to be productive? This is an outdated, discriminatory tax that needs to be eliminated.

My bill, H.R. 2460, is currently pending in the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Social Security with 200 cosponsors. Soon, a majority of the House will have cosponsored this legislation. Now, Mr. Chairman, is the time to act so that we can take advantage of the rich wealth of human capital that America's senior work force has to offer.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCHUETTE], who has been a leader in a number of innovative budget matters in this chamber.

Mr. SCHUETTE. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the Budget, I have great regard and respect for the stellar talents of the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] and the ranking member, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL]. Let me first congratulate them and commend them on their hard work and diligence in a process and area that is not easy and which is fraught with difficulty. Certainly these two gentlemen and my colleagues on the Budget Committee have worked long and hard on this whole budget issue.

Mr. Chairman, I rise this evening in opposition to the resolution being presented to us and upon which we will vote soon, and for four basic reasons. First, the allocation of the peace dividend and how we should make decisions and make priorities in terms of the future of America. Second, I am concerned about new taxes and revenues within the resolution. Third, there is defense policy and what it means for national security and to my home State of Michigan. Finally, insufficient funds to win the war on drugs.

The resolution that will be debated and discussed has roughly an $11.5 billion reduction in the defense function. There are some enormous and monumental changes that have occurred around the world. Many of them are positive. I have seen some of them firsthand in Berlin.

But the coercion and fear and intimidation upon the Lithuanian people by the Soviet Union in my opinion is causing a Baltic Curtain to be created upon freedom in Lithuania. It is the darker side of perestroika. It threatens to shatter glasnost.

By those actions we should be reminded and let us not be naive in the conduct of foreign policy and defense policy. If there is to be a peace dividend, I happen to feel there needs to be a deficit reduction dividend and a tax reduction dividend.

I had hoped to offer an amendment that would take the $11.5 billion reduction, the so-called peace dividend, and have some $6.35 billion allocated to tax reduction and roughly $5.15 billion allocated to deficit reduction. That did not occur. I wish it had.

Let us go to taxes. On the issue of taxes in Michigan and I think in most parts of America people are not naive enough to think if you raise taxes, you are going to have a national mortgage burning party on Cadillac Square in Detroit or Pennsylvania Avenue here in Washington.

No, it will be used for new programs. This budget, unfortunately, does not have a capital gains tax reduction, which I feel would be a kick start and a jump start for entrepreneurial growth for new business startups in this country. That is lacking. It is deficient. I am voting no.

With respect to defense policy, we see an $11.5 billion deficit reduction in the resolution on the floor. The other body is talking about some $13.9 billion roughly in defense reductions.

What that will do is cut into the meat of our conventional strength, like the M-1 tank.

When you see the modernization of Soviet tank production across the world, where they have outproduced the United States by a ratio of 5 to 1 in 1986 and 1988 and 3.5 to 1 in 1987, they are retiring their T-10 tanks. They had spoke wheels. Let us make sure we negotiate conventional force reduction from a position of strength. If you reduce by the amount that many have talked about, it will cut into that M-1 tank production. That is unwise for America's national security objectives and for people in Michigan.

Finally, drugs. To win the war on drugs it is important that we have sufficient funds to win the war. When I see only $230 million for new prison construction, with the Federal prison in Michigan being overcrowded at a 93-percent capacity, law enforcement officials in Michigan react to this function, this absense of funds in terms of winning the war on drugs, they are saying no.

When you look at the education side, it is a two-front war, education and enforcement. I happen to feel we should target specific funds toward the Drug Awareness Resistance Education Program, the DARE Progam, where you reach new children K through 6 at a young age to instill in them resistance techniques, peer pressure. We need to target specific dollars and cents to school districts to win the war on drugs and teach and educate young people the perils of substance abuse.

So whether it is sufficient funds in the war on drugs, defense policy miscalcuations, higher taxes, which we do not need, or if there is to be a peace dividend let it be a tax reduction dividend and a deficient reduction dividend, these conclusions draw me to the decision of voting no on the resolution.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution reported by the committee represents a flawed vision for both America's future and the peace dividend. Although I attempted to obtain a rule to offer an amendment redistributing the majority's defense cuts from excess spending to deficit reduction and taxpayer relief, as contained in my House Resolution 359, I was not granted that opportunity. Furthermore, the Budget Committee resolution makes massive cuts in our national defense without providing background to support the number and provide guidance for Members to determine their soundness and vote accordingly. Additionally, funding for our Nation's war on drugs is insufficient and misdirected. The fact that the budget resolution is on the floor today, as opposed to the beginning of the month, will attest to the necessity of including budget reform in any serious policy statement. Even as a negotiating document, this resolution is sadly incapable of providing the visionary leadership the times require.

There are two central problems with the policy in this document. Primarily, the $100 billion in taxes contained give sufficient reason to reject the resolution out of hand. Furthermore, there is $114 billion in program expansions over the baseline in this resolution. The peace dividend should be applied toward deficit reduction and taxpayer relief, as my amendment would have done.

There are a number of other provisions as or nearly as objectionable as the new taxes and programmatic increases. The $30 billion in budget authority and $11.5 billion in outlays to be reduced in the defense function were proposed in the absence of any submission by Secretary Cheney. The committee is perfectly aware that the Secretary is in the process of working up a recommendation for a safe, responsible defense build down—one which will cause the minimum of job and economic dislocation, meet any anticipated continued threat abroad, acknowledge our role as defender of freedom, and yet respond realistically to the changes in the world which have happened so quickly in the past 6 months, and which continue to evolve as we speak.

In this context, it is important to remember that the numbers in question are put forward without any backup. Presumably, these will be fought out in the authorizing and appropriating committees. However, in this case, absent any departmental recommendation, I feel compelled to add—as at least one member noted during committee debate—that it is always conventional procurement programs which get short shrift in such cases—precisely the programs which give the taxpayers the most bang for their procurement dollar in our expanded role as defender of freedom across the globe. This is especially true of programs such as the M–1 tank.

The Soviet Union still out produces the United States by thousands of modern tanks per year. Last year, for instance, Soviet tank production was 3,000 units. By comparison, the United States produced only 720 M–1 tanks last year. The U.S.S.R. is projected to produce at least 1,500 units this year, in spite of the resource scarce Soviet economy—nearly 10 times the U.S. production of 186 tanks to date in 1990. Their new tanks roll through the distressed, resource deprived communities of Lithuania. There would seem no clearer argument for continued production of tanks and other conventional hardware than this prime example of their continued necessity. Yet, the resolution appears silent on this issue.

Furthermore, the proposed defense reductions are not used to produce a peace dividend for either deficit reduction or taxpayer relief. Many Members of both bodies have proposed reduction in the burden of the lower and middle income taxpayer. Many would prefer legislation such as H.R. 4104 and 4105, which provide an increased standard deduction and/or increased individual retirement account deduction for those truly lower and middle income taxpayers. Legislation such as H.R. 4104 and 4105 would allow these taxpayers flexibility to make choices as to which items they most truly need—child care, housing, education, catastrophic or long term medical care. Members have also expressed interest in an increase in the earned income tax credit, or a variety of other worthy tax reductions. These tax reduction proposals are so numerous among bills introduced in this session of Congress that one would assume even a negotiating document, as this is advertised to be, would take into account the very numbers of proposals to reduce the tax burden and act accordingly.

Furthermore, where is the capital gains tax reduction for which a majority of Members voted last year? H.R. 4103 would provide a 15 percent flat capital gains rate for individuals, and a 10 percent rate for individuals who invest in the future of our Nation's economy by funding startup enterprises. Other Members have proposed similar legislation. Yet no notation is made not only of the will of the House, but of the will of the American taxpayer for a change in the Tax Code to spur job and opportunity creation. As most experts in the field acknowlege, this proposal would bring in revenue. Thus, if the majority truly cannot survive any markup without increasing the inexorable revenue intake of the Treasury, why is a cut in the capital gains rate, on which the opinion of the House has already been expressed, not specified?

The resolution is certainly specific enough as to how the American taxpayer's burden will be increased. Rather than providing deficit reduction and opportunity, a true peace dividend for the American taxpayers from the perhaps importunate defense cuts, or giving sufficient credit to average Americans to assume that they might just have enough common sense to figure out how best to spend their own money, the majority has added $114 billion of new spending over the 5-year period. This new spending, which will fund increased Federal and State bureaucratization of social spending, is an insult to the taxpayer who has a right to choose his own spending options—a right frequently ignored by the majority, which would do well to remember these very issues were central to events such as the Boston tea party.

This $114 billion does not count one of the most egregious insults to taxpayer common sense to come down the legislative pipeline in years, a child care program which presumes Americans not only can barely be trusted to choose care for their children, but that any sectarian providers chosen must be zealously regulated, to the point of removing the sectarian nature of the program which led the parent to choose it in the first place. This folly, which certainly seems to the constituents of the 10th District of Michigan to violate the concept of separation of church and state, has been built into the resolution's baseline—even before enactment. Sensible people would have only included funding for truly fair programs, which do not imperil the religious nature of child care chosen precisely for its religious nature.

Additionally, the new programs include inadequate drug funding which does nothing to address the crisis in our Nation's prison overcrowding. When this country has securely locked away those who would peddle drugs to our children and other citizenry, rather than turning them loose or over to parole boards for lack of judges and prisons, we shall have far fewer drug users to rehabilitate. The $23 million provided in the baseline for prison funding will not go far in a system where the Federal prison in Milan, MI is 93 percent overcrowded.

Costly entitlement programs are expanded by at least the admitted $15 billion over 5 years. The resolution, of course, fails to mention these add ons will cost States an equivalent amount, and indirectly force more State and local burdens onto our citizens.

The entitlement boondoggle is enhanced when one realizes the purported removal of Social Security from the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit does nothing more than discount the revenues coming into the trust fund, while failing to provide any adequate surety for the interest payments from which a substantial amount of the surplus is derived.

Furthermore, the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction targets which have resulted in what little fiscal discipline has been exerted in this Congress over the past 5 years are not extended to ensure the future of either deficit reduction or the Social Security trust fund surpluses being accumulated to pay our future obligations. Inevitably, given the mood of some in Congress as expressed by this document, this deficit will increase and those funds will be raided, ensuring precisely what the majority seems to intend: yet a greater tax burden in the future. No doubt to be used so that those in Congress may continue to dole out programs which take from the majority of lower and middle income taxpayers in order to provide service little needed by those who foot the bill, but much loved by the special interests those who will expand or create them serve.

If this is a negotiating document it fails to take into consideration the most important budget process reforms, such as those contained in H.R. 1957 and legislation I shall shortly introduce. Protection of Social Security and deficit reduction ensured by extension of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets into the second half of the 1990's in order to truly balance the Federal budget. Every member of the committee is perfectly aware that reforms such as line-item veto, a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution, multiyear budgeting—of which this supposed 5-year plan might represent an example were it as advertised—rescission authority, supermajorities to increase taxes or entitlement spending and even more technical details will be a part of any landmark legislation which deals honestly with deficit reduction.

The irresponsibility of direct and indirect increases in taxation and huge programmatic expansions contained in this document are deplorable. Although there are three truly commendable items in the proposal, full funding for the drug abuse resistance education grants [DARE]—which I have pending legislation, H.R. 3723, to reauthorize—and Camp David accord nations—which Mr. BERMAN and I sought last year—and logical, fully funded $100 million base for support of agricultural research needed to assist in feeding the world's population and moving forward in applied agricultural industries, surely the majority should be able to provide a better vision for America's future even if it is only for use as a bargaining tool. Americans as individuals are far better equipped to spend their own money than their elected representatives.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, at this time what I would like to mention is that part of that Republican package we have been talking about tonight contains a document that is supported by 70 percent of the American public. It has 245 cosponsors on it. It is called the balanced budget amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

□ 1930

Why would somebody from New Hampshire be the one to talk about the balanced budget amendment? Frankly, I cannot think of anyone better than somebody from New Hampshire, because the tax foundation has just reported that New Hampshire is the No. 1 State in the Nation to reach tax freedom day. We have already had our tax freedom day. April 19 came and went, and New Hampshire had paid its share of taxes, and was now ready to spend the rest of the year earning money for their families and their kids and their own enjoyment.

Next month at some point various other States around the Union will reach tax freedom day, because they do not have the kind of system that New Hampshire has for controlling spending and taxes.

What is our secret? What is it that makes us the No. 1 State in the Nation for having the lowest per capital taxes?

The secret is actually so simple that it is a secret that no one in this Chamber could ever learn. Low taxes are the result of low spending. That is a quote from Meldrim Thomson, Jr. who was Governor of New Hampshire from 1972 to 1978. He ran on the slogan of "Axe the tax," and Mel Thomson said, and it is worth repeating, low taxes are the result of low spending.

This building that I work in, however, is the result of high taxes and high spending. The U.S. Congress, which is the capital of big spending, is the problem. And the problem can be solved right here on this floor if we pass the balanced budget amendment.

The reason is very simple. In the U.S. Constitution under article 1, section 8 it says that Congress has the power to lay and collect taxes, Congress has the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States. That is our Constitution. There is no limit in that document. We can keep laying on the taxes and we can keep borrowing the money without limit. And it is easy because we make these greenbacks down here in Washington. We print them here, and we can keep printing as many as we want. And we do not have to balance the budget, and we do not have to worry about borrowing and taxing because the taxpayers are the ones who have to worry about it, and that is the wrong attitude. That is not the way we are going to get this spending mess under control.

The budget that the House is going to be voting on soon that comes out of the other side of the aisle is a $19 billion tax increase just for the first year. If we look at the 5-year projection, it is a $117 billion tax increase. That is not the way to begin balancing the budget.

The American public wants us to cut the budget. So where are we going to get this 800-pound gorilla to get on the dome of the Capitol and try to force us to only spend what we have and to stop raising taxes and to stop printing greenbacks, and stop borrowing money?

It is a very simple answer. It is this document right here, House Joint Resolution 268. It is sponsored by 245 Members of the House. They signed their names right on the front and on the back of the first two pages. It is a bipartisan amendment to the Constitution, and 245 is well above a majority of this House of 218.

But that is where things get complicated, because around here just because a majority of the Members support something does not mean they ever get to vote on it, because we do not operate under the normal rules of majority democracy in this Chamber. We operate under autocracy by committee chairmen.

I wrote my committee chairman, JACK BROOKS of Texas, because he is the guy that has jurisdiction over House Joint Resolution 268. I wrote JACK on March 1 and I said JACK, why do we not have by April 1, as we get up to the year anniversary of the balanced budget amendment being put into the House, have it reported out of our Judiciary Committee and on the floor because 70 percent of the American people want it, and we get paid to come down here and debate and talk about these things. I have not heard from him, never got a peep from him, not even a grunt or a letter, and so we have moved forward, we have filed a rule to help bring this matter to the floor, and very shortly, I am confident, within the next week or 2 weeks, a discharge petition will be filed that has to be kept secret under an arcane ruling of the Parliamentarian back in 1934. But it has to be kept secret because there is a catch. If we are going to place this out of a committee chairman's hands, we are going to keep the name secret, and the catch there is that then we can go to the voters and say oh yes, sure, I am on this balanced budget amendment, I am a supporter, and I will vote for it.

"But are you man enough, like John Hancock 200 years ago, to sign it in public?"

"Well, no, I would not sign a discharge petition, because the committee chairman might get mad at me, my fellow Democrats over there might get irritated with me."

So that is the problem. We have another budget, another resolution, another $117 billion in additional taxes from the Democrats. And are they going to give us a vote on the balanced budget amendment? Are we going to be able to take the U.S. Constitution and put some kind of an external limit on use? No.

April 15 is the day that all the millions and millions of taxpayers out there had to comply with the law, they had to pay their taxes. April 15 is also the date that in this Chamber we were supposed to have a budget resolution. Today is April 25, 10 days later. We have already broken the law, but we do not care because we make the laws here. We can ignore them or we can suspend them.

That is why Gramm-Rudman will not work. The only thing that will work, that 800-pound gorilla, is going to be an amendment to this document, the fundamental charter of our land, because Congress cannot ignore the Constitution, Congress cannot just suspend the Constitution, and it is the only thing, Mr. Chairman, that is ever going to bring the spending under control here, because it will force us to say here is the pie, this is the revenue, how do we divvy it up, how do we cut the slices. Someone will get a bigger slice, and someone will get a smaller slice, and politicians do not like to do that, so what we do every year is we buy a bigger pie, and that is why this thing just keeps going and going, and why our capital markets are a mess, because every time the Federal Government borrows another $150 billion it is money that is not available in my State to be loaned out for new construction, new businesses and job expansion.

So Mr. Chairman, as part of our package we are going to begin a move for a vote by July on the balanced budget amendment, and hopefully we will find out if the leadership of the House is willing to allow the American public's representatives that they elect and they hire to come here and deal with these matters to vote on the balanced budget amendment to the Constitution. I am not too optimistic, so I think we are going to have to go the discharge route. But hopefully in the next week and the next few days as we debate the budget we may hear from the Speaker a firm commitment from that microphone that will give us the right to vote on what 245 Members of this House have put their name on; namely, an amendment to the Constitution to balance the budget once and for all, and end all of this ridiculousness that we go through every summer here in Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of the time for the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. MCCURDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WISE].

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much for yielding the time. I did want just 5 minutes, but I did want to take some time to respond to the constitutional amendment proposal.

Just so everyone understands, I am not signing that petition, and I note with interest that it was called the 800-pound gorilla.

A lot of times the reason people ask for constitutional amendments is because they say it is something that the States have had, and I might note that if it is an 800-pound gorilla, for instance, in my own State, and under the last Republican administration, as a matter of fact, they managed to run with a balanced budget amendment as well as a line item veto and managed to run up a $200 million deficit in a $1.5 billion general fund budget so that the 800-pound gorilla turned out to be a 5-pound wimp, and indeed that is the problem. If somebody wants to get around it, the Chief Executive or the Congress or the Legislature, they usually can. So let us just have honest budgeting.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to turn to infrastructure and the Humphrey-Hawkins and full employment and investment.

□ 1940

We heard a lot in the eighties about supply side. My thesis was that supply side might be valid, but it was just a problem that the wrong side was being supplied. I think we ought to talk about what the right side to be supplied is, and that is investment, investing in our own economy.

It is public sector investment and it is private sector investment. Public sector investment has lagged behind, our economy has lagged behind our budget process for many years.

Happily, this budget resolution, the Democratic budget resolution, begins to take the first step, and I emphasize, only the first step, toward rectifying that situation.

I would like to go over some statistics on public sector investment, our infrastructure. The National Council on Public Works, which made a report to President Reagan shortly before he left office, a bipartisan group, recommended spending $90 billion a year on maintaining our infrastructure, indeed enhancing it somewhat, but basically maintaining it.

All the Government agencies combined are now spending only $45 billion. So we are spending 50 cents of every dollar that needs to be spent to keep us even competitive, much less to advance us.

Let us take a look at our highway system because we need a new era of roads. My hope is that in the 1991 reauthorization bill you will see that begin. The interstate system, some 42,000, 43,000 miles is almost complete, and it is time to begin a new era of roads to get us out of the rush-hour traffic, get our transportation, get our goods moving as they should be.

The United States road network handles 1.8 trillion vehicle miles per year. Eighty percent of this is on Federal-aided highways.

Sixty-two percent of paved roads in the United States are in need of some repair. About 130,000 miles of highway all told.

Roughly 41 percent of the Nation's bridges need some repair of some kind. I might add, in some States it is larger than that. In my own State of West Virginia, for instance, it is 50 percent. So when you know that you have a 40-percent chance of driving over a bridge which is in need of substantive repair, that is a serious matter. Let us talk about airports for a second. I mentioned earlier 18 of our Nation's airports today, major airports, are considered severely congested. That number will double by the year 1996.

Yet this is how we are supposed to stay competitive.

What does infrastructure investment bring us? A study by the Federal Reserve economist in Chicago estimates that for every 1 percent of infrastructure investment you can see productivity increase four-tenths of 1 percent. I think that is significant because I think on both sides of the aisle we agree that the desire is to increase productivity.

So that dollar of investment, infrastructure investment, means that you can see a direct, tangible increase in productivity.

Do other nations see it this way? You bet.

Japan, for instance, with a population one-half the size of ours, invests five times as much as the United States in its public infrastructure.

In public infrastructure we are talking about roads, bridges, highways, sewer systems, airports, water systems, inland waterway systems, locks and dams and ports, those things that make us more productive.

Can you trace the decline in our infrastructure spending to a decline in productivity or, perhaps better stated, failure to increase our productivity to the same extent other nations are? Once again, you bet.

For instance, the United States has averaged only seven-tenths of 1 percent growth in productivity over the past decade, a dismal, dismal statistic.

Meanwhile, we have seen our trading partners' productivity in many areas go much higher. The figure that really gets me sometimes is when I find out that the United States is 55th in the world in infrastructure involvement. It does not do me much good to know that New Zealand and Suriname are probably spending more on infrastructure, public infrastructure, than the United States.

There has been a steady decline in infrastructure in past budgets. I guess that is one of the concerns I have.

I would like for this budget to go further than it has, but I appreciate what Chairman PANETTA has done for the first time in recent budgets, permitting increased spending out of the highway trust fund, $1.3 billion in obligational authority alone over the President.

I am really rolling on highways now, and I appreciate the gentleman yielding me this additional time. Mr. Chairman, we are on the road.

We will be spending $1.3 billion of increased obligational authority which translates over the 5-year life of this budget to $19 billion of obligation authority for highways. Incidentally, that is money that has already been paid into the highway trust fund. It is simply being used to reduce the deficit, not being used to construct highways like it was intended to.

The chairman also included $300 million for the airport improvement program over what was previously asked for so that we can begin to get on the serious business of building our airports.

So this budget, I think, meets the standard of investment for the first time. It also meets the Humphrey/Hawkins requirements. It begins to get this country moving again.

We could do more. We ought to be looking at capital budgeting; we ought to be looking at increased spendout of the trust funds. But I think it is significant to note that this budget does begin the process of rebuilding America. I think for that reason alone on top of a lot of other reasons it is a budget we need to support. We need to be investing in America, and that process needs to begin now.

Mr. McCURDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I associate myself with the remarks of the chairman of the Joint Economic Committee, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HAMILTON], who preceded me this evening. I appreciate the gentleman yielding his time so that I may speak.

Mr. Chairman, I am angry. I am angry at ourselves for the paralysis of the American political system which produced this budget and the lack of political courage that has been demonstrated in the debate surrounding the budget.

This budget is further evidence that the United States, which is generally regarded as the world's most powerful Nation, has become, through its own actions, a mere spectator on the international economic and political stage. Where we once took actions to exercise our influence, we now can only muster the strength to react. And in some instances, we cannot even do that.

There was a time when the United States had a sense of vision and purpose about its role in the world. After winning WWII, the "hot war," against the Germans, Italians, and Japanese, leaders such as Harry Truman, George Marshall, and George Kennan implemented foreign and economic policies which led to the creation of NATO, the containment of Communist aggression, and the reconstruction of Western Europe and Japan. With character and resolve, these men, in effect, created the framework which allowed us to win the "cold war."

But with the collapse of communism in Eastern Europe and the triumph of democratic ideals around the world, the question we should be asking ourselves is: Are we prepared to muster the necessary courage to enhance our economic competitiveness to meet the next challenge which faces us—the competition for new world markets?

Mr. Chairman, if we adopt this budget, I fear that the answer will be an emphatic "No." Our objective should be to move from a policy of containment to one of attainment—the attainment of a more peaceful, economically prosperous, and democratic world. The real challenge is to keep our economy growing—not only to meet our international commitments, but to raise the standard of living for all Americans, not just the wealthy.

But once again, this body has been asked to vote on a budget which is based on smoke, mirrors, creative accounting, and a severe lack of political courage. With all due respect to my colleagues who crafted this bill, and in full recognition of the ludicrous budget that was submitted by the administration, I am convinced that this resolution does a disservice to the American people.

Mr. Chairman, for many years now, economic analysts of all persuasions, have argued that the U.S. economy could not function indefinitely on borrowed money. Yet this inconvenience did not deter the previous administration or the Congress from enacting budgets which rested on our ability to borrow astronomical amounts of money at home and abroad to finance our own reckless fiscal policies. And it is with no small amount of irony that, at the same time, we were wringing our hands about the dangers posed by huge debt in many Third World countries.

But in this new era of cooperation between Congress and the Executive, it appears that the American people cannot expect any dramatic departures from the status quo.

As we watched our competitive edge and our once-secure foreign markets, began to dissipate during the last half of the 1980's, some decided that it was more politically expedient to level criticisms against those countries who were experiencing spectacular economic growth. Although the most prominent target was the Japanese, the Germans and the Koreans were also the subject of similar campaigns.

But it should come as no surprise that these countries were also those which had coherent economic and fiscal policies. The Japanese combined their ingenuity, cooperation between Government and industry and sound investment policies with a high personal savings rate, a strong work ethic, and emphasis on quality. The result was that the American consumer began to make a conscious and voluntary decision to buy Japanese products.

Accordingly, the Japanese now own the world's top 20 banks. The top 13 banks in Japan are now worth $470 billion; the top 50 banks in the United States are worth $110 billion.

While the Japanese, Germans, and Koreans were keeping their fiscal house in order, we chose, instead, to focus on quarterly balance sheets, junk bonds, instant gratification, and 30-second commercials for the next election.

In the meantime, we hogged the world's savings surplus—and hence, the world's pool of capital—for a decade. The situation will become even more precarious as Western Europe unites its economies, Eastern Europe turns to market economies, and the Japanese address their own domestic economic problems. These developments will generate new demands on the international supply of capital and cause further increases in interest rates.

Mr. Chairman, this budget does not do anything to address this situation. It is another example of dodging important issues.

But I would be remiss if I did take note of the Republican contribution to the present state of our budget resolution. On paper, this budget makes an effort to meet the deficit reduction requirements of Gramm-Rudman. But it is based on the administration's own false and rosy economic assumptions. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget, Richard Darman, has displayed once again his considerable talents for creative accounting, and this budget makes use of those talents.

We are further paralyzed by President Bush's legendary phrase, "Read my lips." This is what is known as Presidential leadership in the high councils of the Republican Party. I have heard Members on the other side of the isle complain that Democrats have put new taxes in this resolution. They prefer to ignore the inconvenient fact that the President's budget also included new taxes, but they were referred to as user fees.

Furthermore, a recent decision by political appointees in the Pentagon have demonstrated, once again, this administration's commitment to the status quo and mediocrity. By removing Dr. Craig Fields, one of this country's brightest scientists, from his position as Director of the Defense Advanced Research Agency, the administration has displayed a lack of vision for America's technological future.

Mr. Chairman, some of my colleagues argue, privately, that this resolution is a good step toward a budget summit with the administration.

But I voted against last year's budget summit agreement because it too, was based on faulty assumptions and did not address the issues we face.

Some of my colleagues ask why should Democrats act responsibly when the President submits his own irresponsible budget?

I can only answer that if we don't, who will?

The distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee has offered a "cold turkey" proposal that would achieve real deficit reduction. Why is the House not given an opportunity to vote on his package? Mr. Chairman, I would vote for it.

Some argue that Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI's proposal makes a lot of sense, but he doesn't have enough votes. And besides, some on the Republican side say, it is an election year.

Yet every year, and rightfully so, the Black Caucus is given an opportunity to present its budget resolution, and every year we vote on it.

With the changes occurring around the world and a reduction in the Soviet military threat, I believe we have an opportunity to produce real savings in our defense budget. But we cannot do it all in 1 or 2 years. And any savings that are derived from the defense budget should not be diverted to new domestic programs, but instead should go toward reducing the federal deficit.

Mr. Chairman, I support increased funding for education, infrastructure, and R&D. But more importantly, I am willing to raise taxes, cut other domestic programs which have outlived their utility, freeze cost-of-living-allowances, including those for Members of Congress, and produce a real budget to pay for it.

I just returned from a fascinating trip from Eastern Europe. Other members of the Intelligence Committee and I met with people who have demonstrated genuine political courage. These extraordinary individuals in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Germany, and Yugoslavia were, in many instances, imprisoned for their political beliefs; their lives and those of their families were threatened.

But now they are in positions of leadership and responsibility. These former dissidents are leading the governments of Eastern Europe not because they avoided issues, but because they confronted them with courage.

In this body only a few short weeks ago, we had the privilege to hear Vaclav Havel and Lech Walesa ask for American leadership.

Our answer, unfortunately, is this budget resolution. The United States has relegated itself to a spectator's status because Congress and the administration have refused to challenge and lead Americans. Instead, we have encouraged Americans to ask what our country can do for us, not what we can do for our country.

While in Poland I spoke with Professor Gemerk, a man who is considered to be the brains behind the Solidarity movement and the Thomas Jefferson of Poland as chairman of the committee drafting its new constitution. I asked him what he thought of the administration's approach to the changes in Eastern Europe. He said:

The U.S. administration is too pragmatic. It waits for the smoke to clear before it acts. It should provide greater leadership and direction for all of Europe.

Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that the Germans are not waiting for the smoke to clear. They welcome a speedy integration of Eastern Europe into Western Europe's economy. They see clearly the potential for economic growth and opportunity. A recent report by Deutsche Bank on these new opportunities stated the following:

Such an economic stimulus is welcome at a time when the United States may enter a period of slower growth and restructuring of its economy. During such a phase, everybody, including the United States, should be pleased that Europe stands ready to pick up the slack and move the world economic machine forward, just as the United States has done for the last decade.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not pleased that Germany is poised "to take up the slack."

I also saw the President of Sony in Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, and I can assure my colleagues that he was not waiting for the smoke to clear.

The United States has the good will to be active participants in the creation of a new world order, but our fiscal problems are pressuring us to quit the race before we finish.

Mr. Chairman, America's greatness was once found in our pioneer spirit; an entrepreneurial spirit which encouraged us to take risks for the promise of a long-term reward.

But the last 10 years have seen this attitude slip. The willingness of Congress and the administration to participate in fraudulent budgets no doubt contributed to this slide.

So I intend to vote against this budget because it does not reflect well on this institution, and it does not accomplish the responsibilities that the American people ask of us. This resolution only breeds cynicism and contempt.

I urge my colleagues to consider these thoughts. Although we may be able to make a few constituent groups happy with this budget, we will miss a unique opportunity not earned by us, but by the vision of others before us.

□ 1950

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Budget, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I will have no further speakers this evening, and after my comments I intend to yield back the balance of my time. However, I do want to make a few comments with regard to the debate that has taken place tonight. I think there are many Members that believe that it is important to make the tough choices with regard to deficit reduction, and that we think that those choices need to be made both by the President as well as by the Congress. However, there is a difference between posturing on tough choices and getting the institution to pass tough choices, and that problem is not so much substantive as political, because the problem is that both parties have taken positions on issues that have to be confronted, that make it very difficult for the institution as a body to adopt what we would call tough, hard choices with regard to deficit reduction.

□ 2000

But my responsibility as Budget Committee chairman is not simply to sit back and wait and hope and pray. The responsibility of this institution is to move forward with a budget resolution that attempts to address the issues of our time. There are dramatic changes taking place in the world. No one questions that. Indeed there are changes that demand that we as a nation exert leadership.

From the 1980's we have a legacy of tremendous debt and tremendous unmet needs within our own society.

How does the President's budget respond to these dramatic changes and that legacy? It basically says we should keep the status quo. It says, let us hide from the tough decisions, let us hide from the tough choices, and let us hope that we can perhaps just get by.

So the challenge then focuses on the Congress. The point it seems, for the Congress to make is that we need to send a clear message that as a result of these dramatic changes, we need to show different directions about where this Nation is going.

That is the challenge for the 1990's, and it is the challenge for the next century—the ability to change from a cold war economy to a peacetime economy, the ability to restore our resources, and the ability to invest in those areas that we have to invest in if we are going to remain a strong Nation.

There has been a lot of debate about the defense budget. The experts who have come here to Capitol Hill and who have testified this year on the defense budget have all said that the threat has changed.

Whether it is the former Chiefs of Staff, whether it is the Director of the CIA, whether it is the former Defense Secretaries, whether it is Richard Perle, all of them and others have said the threat has changed, and as a consequence of that we can achieve some reductions in the defense budget.

So the issue is not whether or not we are going to achieve reductions in the defense budget. The issue is, how do we do that, and how do we do it in a gradual and responsible way so we can truly implement strategies for the future that do in fact represent a change, responding to the changed threat that is out there in the world? That is the challenge.

The President's budget in its defense portion actually increases defense spending above the 1990 level, on outlays by $4.3 billion, and on budget authority by $7 billion. Is that responding to the change? Is that considering the changed threat that is out there, the need to begin to make the transition that is essential for us in the 1990's, or are we just going to repeat the 1980's? Are we just going to simply increase defense spending, cut nondefense spending, cut entitlement spending, and cut into the needs of our people and develop the kind of tremendous debts and unmet needs we face today? Are we just going to repeat that?

That is really the challenge that faces us. The question is whether or not we are willing to confront that issue.

The defense budget that is here is within the range of responsibility. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee on the Senate side has essentially said that we have got to confront this kind of changed situation. He would reduce the budget some $12.5 billion below the number with regard to budget authority, and his outlay number is very close, frankly, to the number that we have provided in the budget resolution.

The chairman of the Senate Budget Committee goes below the numbers that we have presented in our budget resolution. So the committee's resolution is at midpoint with regard to those who are beginning to present options within the institution. We think it presents a gradual and responsible reduction in the defense area.

What do we do with the savings we achieve on the defense budget? Half of that goes for deficit reduction, and, yes, half of it goes for investment in the economy. Why should it not? The President of the United States is talking about a kinder and gentler America. He talks about the need to be the education President, but he cut education funding in his budget. We provide $2.5 billion in this budget for education, because it is something that needs to be addressed in this country when we are facing a competitive world out there.

He talks about transportation. He says, "There is a crisis out there, but I'm sorry, the States are going to have to deal with it, the communities are going to have to deal with it." I say, baloney. That is a responsibility we all have to face and that we all have to confront. This budget does that. It provides $1.3 billion from the highway trust fund to try to confront the transportation problems in this country.

The same thing is true with regard to nutrition and health care and housing and in the area of helping the democracies out there that need our help.

We can talk a good line, but the real test of this country is whether or not we are willing to commit ourselves to in fact deal with those problems. Those are the issues we confront in this budget. That is the challenge of the 1990's, that is the challenge of the next century. We cannot hide from it. That is the opportunity that faces us now, and if we walk away from that and say, "Oh, somehow there is a better deal out there; I don't know where it is, but maybe it is out there," then we have not faced that challenge.

Mr. Chairman, I think the resolution that is before the Committee gives us the opportunity to address those challenges and to provide that new direction for this Nation.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Chairman, I have been a Member of the House for 16 years, and for 16 years I have fought for realistic and responsible Federal budgets. The budget resolution is the time to make tough choices, set priorities, and meet obligations. This year, again, the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1991 is a disappointment.

I believe that the great reforms in Eastern Europe, and to a lesser degree in the Soviet Union, warrant a realignment and reduction in United States defense spending. For the past 5 years, defense spending has been cut by 12 percent in real dollar terms. Whether taken as a percentage of the Nation's GNP, or as a percentage of Federal spending, defense spending is lower than it has been in 50 years. President Bush has proposed additional deep reductions which would lead to even further negative growth. We have been cutting defense spending by significant amounts while realistically maintaining our Nation's security.

It is important to remember that the so-called peace dividend resulting from cuts in defense spending is more myth than reality. Especially in the shadow of the Federal budget deficit, we cannot believe that the reality of spending less on defense allows us the luxury of recklessly spending more on the expansion of entitlement programs or on social spending.

The costs of today's entitlement programs come back to haunt us tomorrow. They must be funded year after year, and they usually get more expensive as time passes. As I have stated on this floor before, the peace dividend is a one-time bonus. Once spent, it is gone.

There are already existing, critical priorities which can be more easily met following a further reduction in defense spending, such as the fight against drug use. Changes in Federal spending should focus on the elimination of wasteful spending and increasing efficiency to get more results from every taxpayers' dollar.

The concurrent budget resolution does address some of the realistic obligations of the Federal Government, including a 4.1-percent cost-of-living adjustment for retirees and both civilian and military Federal employees, and I will continue to support these measures and work for their passage in any final budget resolution. However, I will not support unrealistic, premature slashing cuts in defense spending, nor will I support the reckless spending of illusory revenues that will unnecessarily add to the Federal budget deficit.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. MCNULTY] having assumed the chair, Mr. MCCURDY, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995, had come to no resolution thereon.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT AUTHORIZING LINE-ITEM VETO BY THE PRESIDENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. 101-179)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I forward to you today a Joint Resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to authorize the President to disapprove or reduce items of spending authority and to disapprove substantive provisions contained in appropriations measures.

Amending our national charter is a profoundly serious step, and I am fully aware of the great responsibility involved in proposing such an action. My proposal, however, is supported by ample precedent. Today, the Governors of 43 of the 50 States have line-item veto authority, and for more than a century American Presidents have urged the Congress to adopt this reform at the Federal level. We have never needed it more than now. By enabling the President to open up massive omnibus spending packages and pare out wasteful and unneeded spending, this amendment would address one of the most serious and intractable issues facing the Nation today—the collapse of Federal fiscal discipline that has helped to saddle us with trillions of dollars of debt.

This amendment has been painstakingly crafted to ensure that the Congress has a chance to pass on each item lined out of a bill, using procedures essentially identical to those now in the Constitution. Its only purpose is to enable both the President and the Congress to take a closer look at the way we spend the taxpayer's money—to bring out into the sunlight the kinds of hidden, abusive spending proposals that would never make it on their own.

I look forward to working with you on this proposal, and I am confident that by enacting it we will place the Constitution and the Nation on a sounder footing than ever before.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR DEMOCRACY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 504(h) of Public Law 98-164, as amended (22 U.S.C 4413(i)), I transmit herewith the sixth Annual Report of the National Endowment for Democracy, which covers fiscal year 1989.

GEORGE BUSH.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1990.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 3848, DEPOSITORY INSTITUTION MONEY LAUNDERING AMENDMENTS OF 1990

Mr. MCCURDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossment of H.R. 3848, the clerk be authorized to correct section numbers, punctuation, and cross references and to make such other technical and conforming changes as may be necessary to reflect the actions of the House in passing the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

HOUSE GAG RULE

(Mr. DOUGLAS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend his remarks, and to include extraneous material.)

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, there is a secret list in the House. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. INHOFE] and I want to end this outrageous practice of hiding from the public the names of people who have signed the discharge petitions that are kept right up here behind me. Today we are introducing a bill that will outlaw this secrecy practice and open up the House so that the folks who come here and the people who want to know what we sponsor, how we vote, can also know whether we are willing to stand up and be counted against an autocratic liberal committee chairman who says, "I don't like your bill. I don't care if 300 people sponsor it. You are not getting it on the floor of this House."

The discharge petition is a secret process. It is also an outrage. We are introducing a bill to end that practice, and I hope all the Members will support us, just as the Wall Street Journal did this morning in an excellent editorial.

Mr. Speaker, I include the Wall Street Journal article as follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, Apr. 25, 1990]

HOUSE GAG RULE

The same congressional leaders who in the name of open government demand more and more access to executive-branch documents—even including Ronald Reagan's personal diaries—are the protectors of a secret list that prevents the American people from knowing where their representatives really stand. A lone Member has now decided to risk the anger of the House leadership by ripping away the veil of secrecy.

In the 1950s and 1960s, autocratic House committee chairmen routinely bottled up civil-rights bills and refused to let them come to a floor vote. Today, popular bills ranging from amendments to balance the budget and ban flag desecration are routinely buried in committee because the liberal House leadership opposes them and wants to avoid votes that could be used against incumbents.

There is only one real way a majority of Members can bring legislation to the House floor if it is blocked in committee: They must produce a discharge petition. If 218 Members—a House majority—sign a discharge petition, the relevant committee must either vote out the bill or agree to a floor vote. However, only 19 of 347 discharge petitions have succeeded.

This is because the list of Members who have signed a petition is kept secret—until the required 218 sign. Only Members can view the list, and then only briefly to make certain their name is on it.

They must first go to the Clerk's desk in the House chamber. They are handed a statement signed by the Clerk and Speaker informing them that disclosing the names of signers, or the number of names, is "strictly prohibited under the precedents of the House." The sole precedent is an arbitary 1931 prohibition by Speaker John Nance Garner that was never made part of offical House rules.

This restriction has made it easy for Speakers to squash discharge petitions. Whenever the list comes close to 218 names, the Speaker routinely pressures Members to drop off. The list's secrecy allows them to conceal their timidity from the voters.

Rep. Chuck Douglas, a former New Hampshire Supreme Court Justice, says the petition's secrecy is in direct conflict with honest and open government. "This covert list allows Members the best of two political worlds," he told us. "They can publicly support a measure, like protecting the flag, while quietly withholding their names from the petition that would accomplish that."

He notes that during last year's popular effort to repeal Section 89 of the tax code, 309 of the 435 House Members signed on to a repeal bill, but less than half that number signed the discharge petition, largely to avoid angering House leaders.

Mr. Douglas has decided to break up this cozy protection for hypocrites. He has just filed a discharge petition to force a vote on his amendment to ban flag descretion. While he is obliged to not reveal the names of signers, he has announced he will disclose the names of any Members who claim to have signed the petition but do not actually do so.

He plans to do the same with a second discharge petition to force a vote on a balanced-budget amendment. It has 246 cosponsors, but Judiciary Committee Chairman Jack Brooks refuses to release it. Rep. Douglas expects a lot of pressure from his colleagues to back down, but he has no intention of budging.

The secret discharge petition is only the latest example of how House Rules—or in this case merely a precedent—are used to shield Members from accountability. We tried to request documents on the history of the discharge petition's secrecy by using the Freedom of Information Act, but were informed that Congress has exempted itself from that law as well.

WILL THE REAL BIG SPENDERS PLEASE STAND UP?

(Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORGAN of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, year after year Congress and the President have grappled with a serious and growing Federal deficit and we've all witnessed the episodes of fingerpointing—who's at fault, who voted for it, who caused it.

The central message from President Reagan and now President Bush has been that the Federal deficit has been caused by a Congress that spends much more than the President desires. Essentially, they are saying "It wasn't us—it's the Democrats' fault." "The Democrats are the big spenders," they claim.

I thought it would be interesting to find out just how much spending President Reagan and now President Bush have been requesting during this past decade and then compare that with how much spending Congress has actually enacted.

It seems to me that this comparison is a fair way to evaluate the difference between the Republican administrations and the Democratic Congress.

I recently asked the House Appropriations Committee to compile for me a list of spending requests in the President's budget from 1981 through 1989. I asked them to compare that with final appropriations by Congress during those same years.

The facts are startling.

During the past 9 years, conservative Presidents have requested spending of $4.915 trillion while the so-called congressional big spenders have actually appropriated slightly less that that, $4.897 trillion.

These figures represent all Federal spending for which Congress makes an annual appropriation.

What this information tells us is there is not a plug nickle's worth of difference in how much Republicans and Democrats want to spend. In fact, if anything, the Republicans and Democrats want to spend. In fact, if anything, the Republicans seem to want to spend more than the Democrats. There is, of course, a radical difference in how they want to spend it.

Democrats want to keep pushing money at social programs and the Republicans want to keep stuffing the Pentagon's pockets with cash. Both could use some lessons in fiscal responsibility.

The point of all of this is to say that, when the President stands up and says the deficit is someone else's fault, the numbers just do not support that conclusion. It is the fault of all of us—the White House and the Congress.

We do spend too much. I think Republicans and Democrats, in the White House and in Congress, should understand that the taxpayers are getting a little tired of bloated Government. They are also tired of deficits and they are tired of excuses.

My purpose today is simply to expose the myth, put forward first by Ronald Reagan and now by George Bush, that it is really somebody else's fault. The numbers show, in fact, these two Presidents have proposed more spending than any Presidents in history and have proposed more spending than Congress has been willing to enact. So the next time someone asks, "will the real big spenders please stand up?"—all of Washington should get on their feet—especially Presidents Reagan and Bush.

Printed below are the numbers compiled for me by the Appropriations Committee for the years 1981–89.

A TRIBUTE TO DAVE WELTY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COYNE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. COYNE. Mr. Speaker, I became aware not long ago that a friend of mine, Dave Welty, is retiring.

At first, I hardly believed it. It is difficult to imagine Pittsburgh's City Hall without Dave. He has been the press secretary for five mayors of Pittsburgh—Thomas Gallagher, Joseph Barr, Pete Flaherty, Richard Caliguiri, and Sophie Masloff. His public service goes back to the late 1950's, and he was one of Pittsburgh's leading journalists before that.

Over the years, he has become an institution.

But it is true. He is leaving City Hall. Dave announced that he is retiring at the end of this month.

I remember Dave from my days as a member of the Pittsburgh City Council. His job was not always easy. There were times when it required the diplomacy of Kissinger, the patience of Job, and the footwork of Astaire. But Dave Welty always had what it takes. He is the best in the business.

All of us in Pittsburgh public life will miss his good work. I know my colleagues join me in wishing him well in retirement, where life will undoubtedly be a bit more tranquil.

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette recently printed an article by Andrew Sheehan about Dave Welty's retirement. I would like to request that it be reprinted in the RECORD.

PRESS AIDE TO FIVE MAYORS DECIDES IT'S TIME TO RELAX

(By Andrew Sheehan)

After decades of holding the middle ground between the city's press corps and five Pittsburgh mayors, Dave Welty has decided to leave the battle to someone else.

As is his morning practice, the mayor's press secretary began yesterday by dropping a news release on the desk of each television, radio and newspaper reporter in the city pressroom.

But instead of a street closing or new city appointment, the paper tersely told of his own retirement, effective April 30.

"It's just time," he explained.

Dressed in his wrinkled brown suit, Welty took a seat behind his desk and the nameplate reading "Minister of Truth."

Rocking gently in his chair, the avuncular man of 66 divulged his secret for longevity in a job that deserves hazardous duty pay.

"It's always been a policy of mine not to know anything," he said.

Although each mayor—Thomas Gallagher, Joseph Barr, Pete Flaherty, Richard S. Caliguiri and Sophie Masloff—had and still have testy times with reporters, Welty has always retained his credibility with reporters.

Throughout, he has been the keeper of City Hall's zoo-like newsroom. As head of the preserve, Welty puts out a daily feed of pretzels and potato chips for the inhabitants and keeps their jokes about city officials confidential.

After 14 years as a reporter with the Pittsburgh Sun-Telegraph, Welty took the job of secretary with Gallagher in 1959 and retained the post with Barr.

After a brief stint as an aide to county Commissioner Tom Foerster, he returned to Barr as his executive secretary, the top appointed position in city government.

Under Pete Flaherty, relations between the mayor's office and reporters became strained. As press secretary, Welty emerged unscathed.

"Welty managed to use enough charm to stay out of the firing line," said David Warner, a former reporter for both The Pittsburgh Press and the Post-Gazette, who covered the Flaherty administration.

"He was always loyal to the mayor, and he never lost his credibility with the newspeople," Flaherty said.

Welty's list of "nevers" would serve any press secretary well.

Never, he said, become a news source.

"New guys would come in looking for loose lips," he said.

Never lie to reporters.

"I think lies catch up with you," he said. "If someone had to lie, I'd let them do it [themselves]."

Most importantly, as Welty always advised everyone, never take yourself too seriously.

"He was the greatest guy to have around in a time of crisis," said David Matter, the executive secretary to Caliguiri. "He was the guy to look beyond the immediate problem and tell you how other people dealt with the same thing and with good results."

But Welty said he would be missed primarily as a purveyor of snacks. Ever the newspaperman, he suggested a headline for his farewell piece: "Goodbye, Mr. Chips."

DISTRICT SUPPORT FOR H.R. 2497—PROVIDING FOR ALTERNATIVE DISPUTES RESOLUTION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to present to my colleagues recent correspondence from Mr. Dale Nathan of Eagan, MN. Mr. Nathan has provided me with important documentation to support the changes in the Federal contract dispute resolution process included in H.R. 2497 and S. 971. As the below letter indicates, the current lengthy, and expensive, dispute resolution process effectively precludes small businesses from affordable resolution of Government contract disputes.

I am pleased that the House Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Governmental Relations has scheduled for a markup on H.R. 2497 for April 25 and look forward to the subcommittee's consideration of the measures.

Although the enclosures noted below are too expansive to be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I invite interested colleagues to contact my office for copies of the supporting documents.

NATHAN & ASSOCIATES,
ATTORNEYS AT LAW,
Eagan, MN, April 23, 1990.

Congressman WILLIAM FRENZEL,
Bloomington, MN.

Re: Federal Contract Disputes Resolution.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FRENZEL: This latter is for two purposes. The first is to provide you with three case histories that I believe illustrate the need for reform and improvement in the Federal contract disputes resolution process, particularly for small business firms. The second is to request, if it is appropriate and could be useful, that representatives of the three companies whose case histories are given, or myself, be permitted to testify concerning these experiences, or to submit information and documentation in support of S. 971 and H. 2497 and additional reform legislation.

The three case histories are presented in Enclosure 1 to this letter. The companies, all small business firms, are: (1) FDL Technologies, Inc., Duluth, Minnesota, a minority-owned firm; (2) Durable Metal Products, Inc., Minneapolis, Minnesota; and (3) Rex Systems Inc., Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin. Two of the disputes, FDL Technologies, Inc., and Rex Systems Inc., are in litigation before the Armed Services Board of Contract Appeals. The Durable Metal Products dispute is in litigation in the United States Claims Court. Each history illustrates that present Federal contract disputes resolution procedures do not provide a process that is affordable for most small businesses firms or result in resolution within the time needed by small business firms. For example, the Rex Systems Inc. dispute is close to five years old and has cost over $125,000 and we are at the step of waiting for the Board's decision on the first issue—that of liability. If the decision is favorable to the contractor, it could be another two or more years and much more expense before there is any monetary recovery, even for attorney fees and litigation costs.

In the FDL Technologies, Inc. dispute the Army realized over three years after it terminated a contract for default that the termination was unjustified. At the urging of a Board judge the contracting officer withdrew his decision. However, the contractor incurred liability for attorney fees and litigation costs of over $42,000.00, most of which is unpaid. Becuase of problems caused by the Government, the contractor ceased operations in March, 1990.

Durable Metal Products, Inc., which also has ceased operation, submitted a claim in September, 1988, to recover substantial damages it alleges were caused by an irresponsible and unreasonable Quality Assurance Representative (QAR). It took the Government until January, 1990, to issue a final decision. In August, 1989, Durable filed suit in the United States Claims Court on the basis of the refusal of the contracting officer to issue a decision. Durable does not have the funds to finance a costly and protracted litigation. Yet, the Department of Justice has refused so far to agree to binding ADR despite testimony before a House Judiciary subcommittee that binding ADR was acceptable. Durable Metal Products already has incurred liability for more than $81,000 for attorney fees and litigation costs.

The three cases mentioned above could result in tens of thousands of dollars of expense to the public. If the contractor prevails in each proceeding, and the government position is determined not to be substantially justified, both of which I believe to be likely, the contractors will be entitled to recover their attorney fees and litigation costs. In these three instances, that already amounts to over $200,000.

A review of applications for attorney fees and litigation costs in board of contract appeals and United States Claims Court cases discloses that expenditures for these costs typically exceeds $50,000 when the contractor is represented by counsel. Often, the amount for attorney fees and litigation costs in a single case is greater than $100,000. Applications are made under the Equal Access to Justice Act. Expenditures for attorney fees and litigation costs are recoverable when the contractor prevails and the government cannot show that its position was substantially justified. There is no recovery when the contractor loses.

Most small business firms cannot spend $50,000 or more for attorney fees and litigation costs. The result is that an affordable means of resolving Federal contract disputes is not available today for small businesses.

In addition to H. 2497 and S. 971, which I believe would provide significant relief for small business firms in Federal contract disputes resolution, I believe other reforms are needed. These are listed and discussed in Enclosure 2 to this letter. I would be most pleased to travel at my expense to meet with Members of Congress or subcommittee staff personnel to discuss them.

The present system, which allows and even encourages government procurement personnel and counsel to take irresponsible actions and engage in meritless and abusive litigation generates enormous waste. Other consequences of the lack of adequate remedies for small businesses are that the government pays higher prices for products and services when small businesses are ruined or driven from the government contract marketplace. On behalf of FDL Technologies, Durable Metal Products and Rex Systems, and I believe hundreds of other small businesses, I solicit your support in legislating improvements to the Federal contract disputes resolution process to provide means of disputes resolution that are affordable and appropriate for small businesses.

Thank you for considering my views.

Sincerely,

DALE C. NATHAN.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

PASSING ON THE LEGACY OF SHAME

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the continuing popularity of President Bush despite grave public concern about major issues and the future of the Nation will confound historians just as it puzzles contemporary political analysts.

But the public is beginning to understand the severe price we are paying for 10 years of sophistry, symbolism and shocking indifference of the Reagan-Bush administrations.

A recent article in the Nation by Ralph Nader and Mark Green catalogs that sorry record.

The article follows:

PASSING ON THE LEGACY OF SHAME

(By Ralph Nader and Mark Green)

In their 1980s retrospectives, conservative pundits like William Buckley, Pat Buchanan, Cal Thomas and Jeffrey Bell have been exceeding the bounds of exuberance (for example, "Reagan won the cold war"). At least such hyperbole raises two useful questions: First, what are the real legacies of the Reagan-Bush years so far, nine years after their launch; and second, can—or will—President Bush alter them in any serious way?

Using the framework of measurable cause and effect rather than crediting the rooster for the dawn, how have these two Presidents influenced the quality of our lives? Answer: They have been pursuing policies that have quietly sapped America's long-term strength. Here are ten concrete examples out of hundreds, as well as a hint at whether Bush, based on his performance and trajectory, might yet change these legacies:

Infants and Children. Since 1981 the percentage of children living in poverty soared to almost 20 percent, the worst record in the industrial West; after a decade of decline the rate of low birthweight babies rose last year, especially among African-Americans. Cutting infant nutrition programs, Medicaid and prenatal care further hurt the littlest Americans.

Bush has proposed the largest one-year increase in the Head Start program ever offered, $500 million (which would cover only one in five eligible children). However, he offers no suggestions as to how to reduce this country's dismal infant mortality rate (nineteenth in the world). And the self-proclaimed "Education President" shows little more interest in schooling than his predecessor. Although the United States recently ranked fourteenth out of sixteenth industrialized countries in elementary and secondary education spending, Bush proposed only a 1 percent increase (after inflation) in federal education spending.

If this trend continues, students won't even be able to read Bush's lips.

Poverty and Idealism. Homelessness, which had virtually disappeared by the 1970s, grew in significant part only after Reagan cut federal appropriations for low-income subsidized housing by 82 percent. Because funding of discretionary low-income programs fell by 55 percent (after inflation) between 1981 and 1989, there were 3 million more poor Americans at the end of the 1980s than at the start of the decade. Nor did Reagan ever make a major public statement on poverty that tapped the idealism of caring among Americans, as John F. Kennedy did with his Peace Corps address. Indeed, Reagan's principal message to the younger generation was go for the gold, not the golden rule.

President Bush, on the other hand, has laudably talked about citizenship rather than mere commercialism. Consider his now well-worn metaphor about "a thousand points of light" in his inaugural address as well as his assertion that "the greatest gift is helping others" in his State of the Union Message. But while Michael Dukakis could have delivered the same State of the Union speech, Reagan would have submitted a budget just as ungenerous to the most vulnerable Americans. A thousand points of blight?

Lost Economic Prominence: In 1981 the United States was the world's leading creditor nation, with a $141 billion net international investment credit; after eight years of Reagan-Bush, it had become the world's largest debtor, with a total debt of more than $700 billion. The nation's personal savings rate plunged by one-half, real wages fell and in nine years the federal debt grew three times as much as it had since the birth of the Republic. As a result of this borrowed prosperity, "America is losing its ability to compete in world markets," said John Young, chairman of the Presidential Council on Competitiveness.

Recent world events have made it plain that economic power, not military might, will determine who the superpowers of the 1990s are. How are we doing in Bush's America? Not so hot. Nonfarm productivity growth fell to less than 1 percent in 1989, the lowest since the 1981-82 recession. The huge federal deficit is not significantly lower once the Social Security surplus is discounted—nor is the trade defict. Based on the location of available capital, Lech Walesa would have been well advised to have skipped Washington and gone straight to Tokyo. So far President Bush hasn't really dealt with, or even mentioned, the long-term implications of these dismal facts.

Investing in Bombs, Not Bridges. Because of tax cuts for the wealthy coupled with a $2.2 trillion military spending binge (including $30 billion for unneeded spare parts), unpaid bills mounted in the 1980s. In an unprecedented series of reports issued right after the 1988 election, the General Accounting Office documented the deterioration of the nation's infrastructure because of inadequate capital investment. The G.A.O.'s estimated bill for repairing America comes to $500 billion to renovate bridges and the interstate highways system, $150 billion to clean up toxic dumps, $100 billion to $130 billion to decontaminate nuclear weapons facilities, $20 billion for new public housing, and more.

Will the evaporation of the Soviet threat, the ostensible reason for most of our $306.9 billion defense budget, persuade Bush to transfer funds from fighting potential enemies abroad to fighting proven ones at home? Not yet. He seems intent to the "beating plowshares into swords," as Richard Gephardt, the House majority leader, said. A President who says we should spend nearly the same amount combating "complacency" as Reagan did in combating Communism is saying that the Defense Department is an entitlement program.

Consumers Away. Promising in his 1980 campaign to "get government off our backs," Reagan got government (read: law and order) off the backs off corporations by sabotaging the health and safety agencies that were supposed to assure safe food, drugs, pesticides and water, and by immobilizing antitrust laws in the midst of the greatest merger wave of the century. Further, the Reagan-Bush Administration rescinded protections such as a tougher crash standard for motor vehicles that was slated to start saving an estimated 11,000 lives a year on the highways in 1981. This delay has directly caused tens of thousands of serious injuries and deaths on the highways.

In his Economic Report to Congress, President Bush signaled a welcome departure from his predecessor when he recognized that "in some cases, well-designed regulation can serve the public Interest." And new regulations restricting misleading health claims on food packages were considered a good first step by the Center for Science in the Public Interest. Yet Bush allowed the Consumer Product Safety Commission to slip into a coma by failing to appoint enough commissioners (at least three) to form a governing quorum.

Ecocide. For nine years two Presidents shrugged and said, "Who, us worry?" while acid rain ravaged lakes, waste gases widened the hole in the ozone layer and the greenhouse effect warmed up the earth. The Reagan-Bush Environmental Protection Agency will be remembered largely as a place of scandal and stagnation. (Joel Hirschorn, a senior associate at the Office of Technology Assessment, says "not one major complex toxic waste site has ever been completely cleaned up.")

If George Bush thinks he can reverse the James Watt years merely by quoting Teddy Roosevelt and elevating the head of the E.P.A. to Cabinet rank, he's wrong. Instead, he's shown his true hand by opposing serious action on global warming or on clean-air legislation, and by reneging on his promise to protect wetlands. He didn't even include funds in his 1990 budget for a cleanup of Boston Harbor, to which he devoted so much attention in the 1988 presidential campaign, confirming Governor Dukakis's charge that it was "just a phony campaign issue." Environmental President? Or environmentally hesitant?

S&L and HUD Scandals. In what is probably the largest epidemic of financial criminality in American history, the Reagan-

Bush deregulation policies allowed thrift institutions to make reckless or corrupt investments while seeing less of federal auditors. Result: a bailout bill that will amount to more than $3,000 per taxpayer over the next ten years, with no reciprocal rights for taxpayers and depositors or guarantees to prevent future debacles.

The corruption in the Department of Housing and Urban Development showed that it had become an accounts payable for Republican cronies. Conservative columnist James Kilpatrick blames Reagan, who "paid virtually no attention to this huge, costly Department." Meanwhile, the percentage of American families owning their homes actually fell in the 1980s for the first time since World War II.

The department has regained visibility and some respectability under Jack Kemp, but not much money. And don't expect too much from the independent prosecutor who will look into the HUD scandal. Dick Thornburgh, the most partisan Attorney General since John Mitchell, has carefully limited the scope of the inquiry to avoid further embarrassment. As for savings and loans, don't expect more than a fraction of these corporate crooks to face trial.

Regressive Redistribution of Wealth. Because Reagan-Bush cut benefits for the poor and at the same time cut taxes for the rich, the income share of the poorest fifth of the nation's households fell to 3.8 percent, the lowest since the 1950s, and the income of the wealthiest fifth rose to 46.3 percent, its highest ever. This trend will deepen if President Bush's capital gains tax cuts are enacted. Escalating Social Security taxes on working families have wiped out any gains from lower income tax rates and have effectively subsidized.

Will the Bush years bring some real glasnost to the White House? So far, not likely. Bush has proved to be, in the phrase of Georgetown University Law Center associate dean Peter Edelman, "the Revlon President," who applies cosmetic rhetoric to national problems.

Ultimately, though, the state of the Reagan-Bush legacy depends not on a speechwriter's cosmetics but on the actual living conditions of the American people. Has this presidential duo performed well or merely postured well? Will drug use be down? the air cleaner? poverty down and ethics up? Will there be more economic well-being for all Americans or only more wealth for the already powerful? And will Washington face up to our problems or look away?

Vaclav Havel, the playwright President of Czechoslovakia, counseled his people that the highest patriotism is the frank admission of serious problems. For Ronald Reagan and, so far, for George Bush, the idea has been to throw a coat of fresh paint over a house with rotting beams. tax breaks for the richest citizens. Following a proposal by Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan to reduce Social Security taxes, even the conservative Heritage Foundation admitted that "thanks to hikes in the Social Security payroll tax, the vast majority of middle-income Americans forfeit a larger share of their income to the federal tax collector in 1990 than they did in 1980."

Still, Bush insists on a capital gains tax in which 66 percent of the benefits would flow to the top 1 percent of all taxpayers, including himself. (Citizens for Tax Justice has revealed that Bush personally saved $303,516 in federal income taxes between 1980 and 1986 by using the old capital gains tax break.)

These Presidents are two class acts.

Reign of Error and Sleaze. From David Stockman's early admission that he essentially "cooked" the budget books to President Reagan's initial denial of an arms-for-hostages deal in the Iran/contra scandal of Elliot Abrams's documented lies in Congressional testimony, Reagan's two terms showed how routinely tactics conquer truth. And although more than a hundred Reagan appointees either were convicted of crimes or committed ethics violations (Ed Meese's own Justice Department concluded its chief had acted unethically), not once did Messrs. Reagan and Bush reproach the wrongdoers.

The Bush Administration has avoided so deplorable a rap sheet, in part because the Senate kept the ethically suspect John Tower from tainting the Cabinet. But a steady diet of deception (saying Soviet military spending is up when his Pentagon knows it's down; saying there was no quid pro quo to get Honduras to help the contras in exchange for aid when documents prove the opposite; denying a secret mission to Beijing so soon after the Tiananmen Square massacre, for example) shows the lingering influence of President Ronald Pinocchio.

Hostile Race Relations. What did Reagan-Bush do when the percentage of African-American and Latino youths attending college fell and the gap in life expectancy between blacks and whites widened during their decade of governance? They grossly reduced antidiscrimination law enforcement, appointed a largely white judiciary and ridiculed civil rights organizations as, in President Reagan's phrase, mere "special-interest" groups.

George Bush has now gone out of his way to change the tone of his Administration (he said all Americans must "confront and condemn racism, anti-Semitism, bigotry and hate"), in the process attracting a 68 percent approval rating among African-Americans. But his actual policies on affirmative action and job discrimination—his executive branch won't support proposed legislation to reverse several recent Supreme Court decisions hostile to civil rights—are vintage Reagan. "Extremely disappointing" is how Ralph Neas, executive director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, rates them.

As the reactionary revisionism of the Reagan-Bush era contines, let's remember mourning in America: the oft-ignored legacies of economic slippage, child poverty, environmental abuse, racial tensions, S&L sleaze.

THE MEDICARE NURSING FACILITY ACCESS IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1990

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the Medicare Nursing Facility Access Improvement Act of 1990, legislation to improve Medicare beneficiary access to skilled nursing facility [SNF] care.

My bill would repeal the current law requirement that Medicare beneficiaries who need nursing care must first spend at least 3 days in a hospital.

Study after study has demonstrated the need for the Federal Government to develop a comprehensive long-term care program. With the typical annual cost of nursing home care approaching $30,000, even short-term stays in a nursing home can be ruinously costly to beneficiaries. To add to those costs a requirement that beneficiaries spend at least 3 days as a hospital in-patient is unreasonable and additionally burdensome.

In an effort to improve Medicare beneficiary access to nursing care, the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act [MCCA] of 1988 made a number of changes to the Medicare SNF benefit.

The MCCA, for example, expanded the benefit from 100 to 150 days, restrictured the coinsurance required of beneficiaries, and eliminated the requirement that patients needing Medicare SNF care first spend at least 3 days in the hospital before being admitted to a Medicare nursing facility.

I was pleased to have offered the amendment which repealed the 3-day prior hospitalization requirement during Ways and Means Health Subcommittee consideration of the MCCA in 1987.

Unfortunately, the expanded and improved SNF benefit—and with it the elimination of the 3-day prior hospitalization rule—was one of the casualties of last year's decision to repeal the catastrophic coverage law.

The bill I am introducing today would once again repeal the 3-day prior hospitalization requirement, effective January 1, 1991. Thus, beneficiaries requiring nursing care under Medicare could be admitted to a nursing facility without first having to spend time in a hospital.

The 3-day prior hospitalization requirement simply makes no sense. It forces physicians to admit patients who require only nursing care into the hospital, where they are held for at least 3 days and are then admitted to the nursing facility. It follows that the 3-day prior hospitalization requirement imposes needles costs on both the beneficiary and Medicare, and that the repeal would have some cost offsets.

My bill would not alter the current coinsurance requirements or expand the nursing care benefit itself. As much as I supported those changes in 1987–88, I am concerned about the cost of expanding the nursing benefit today without developing an appropriate financing mechanism. But my bill would eliminate a needless barrier to nursing care, and eliminate the costs to patients and Medicare of needless stays in the hospital in order to gain access to nursing care.

This is a simple, cost-effective change to Medicare which will benefit both patients and the Federal Government. I urge my colleagues to support this important proposal.

POLITICS IGNITES FLAG-BURNING ISSUE

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, as Art Buchwald points out in this column, reprinted from the April 10, 1990, Oakland Tribune, President Bush has asked the Supreme Court to rule quickly on the constitutionality of the flag-burning statute.

Buchwald asked the White House why the hurry. The answer was that passage will not take long with "an election coming up."

The article follows:

POLITICS IGNITES FLAG-BURNING ISSUE

(By Art Buchwald)

Those who say that President Bush does not have an agenda are misreading the newspapers. The other day the president requested that the Supreme Court rule on the constitutionality of flag-burning laws as quickly as possible. Bush wants an accelerated timetable in getting a court opinion for what he deems the most important issue of our time—far more urgent than court rulings on capital punishment, abortion, the environment and the social issues that confront the nation today.

The Supreme Court agreed to Bush's request so flag desecration has been put on the justices' front burner, and arguments will be heard in May.

Many Americans are wondering why the hurry. How come the president is so desperate to get a decision, and why did the Supreme Court agree to drop everything to give him one?

A mole in the White House provided me with the answer.

"The president has just received word that there is going to be a rash of flag-burnings this summer, and he wants the court to reverse its earlier opinion that flag-burning laws are unconstitutional."

"How many flags does Mr. Bush expect to be burned this summer?" I asked him.

"Congress directed it to. The law says that the court must expedite any flag-burning appeal as soon as it possibly can."

"Is that because the national security of the country is at stake?"

"That, plus the fact every Republican congressman's election depends on it. No politician can face his constituency while the country's flag is in flames."

"Is this the first time a president has requested that the Supreme Court leapfrog all its cases and rule on something as important as flag desecration?"

"Yes, but the president can't make that request too often because the court doesn't like to be pushed around. At the same time, when the patriotic health of the nation is in danger, then even the Supreme Court cannot sit idly by while people flick their Bics."

"What if the court still declares that the anti-flag-burning law is unconstitutional? What will President Bush do then?"

"He will demand that Congress pass an urgent constitutional amendment in three weeks."

"I thought it took years to pass a constitutional amendment."

"It does if you don't have an election coming up. You need to understand one thing. This country has many problems that it cannot solve. Preventing the burning of the flag is one of the few issues that Bush can deal with. He wants to go down in history as the president who saved the Stars and Stripes. He really deserves credit for getting the Supereme Court on it so fast."

"Will the court rule on it before the summer recess?"

"If they don't, it will be the end of Yankee Doodle Dandy as we know it."

THE U.S. ECONOMIC POSITION IN THE WORLD

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1989

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, April 25, 1990, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE U.S. ECONOMIC POSITION IN THE WORLD

In my meetings with Hoosiers, I find much interest in the U.S. economic position in the world and whether we are declining as a nation. The United States today is enormously powerful. But many challenges lie ahead, and we need to respond to them.

STRENGTH OF U.S. ECONOMY

A popular misconception of Americans is that our country has become a second-rate economic power, lagging behind particularly Japan. That is not the case. By the major economic measures, the U.S. economy is the strongest in the world. The U.S. economy—our annual gross national product—exceeds $5 trillion compared to less than $2 trillion for Japan. In 1987, the U.S. produced 26% of total global output, compared to 9% by Japan, 14% by the Soviet Union, and 22% by the 12 nations of the European Community. U.S. output per capita is the highest of any country, some 40% higher than in Germany and Japan. The average American worker can produce in 31 minutes what the average Japanese worker takes an hour to produce (primarily because of our much higher productivity in services and agriculture). Our population is roughly twice Japan's and four times any country in Europe. In the decade of the 1980s, the U.S. created 21.5 million new jobs, more than any other country and more than all of Europe and Canada combined. The United States is the world's leading exporter, selling $364 billion of merchandise abroad in 1989 compared to Germany's $333 billion and Japan's $275 billion.

LONG-TERM CONCERNS

Although the U.S. remains the pre-eminent economic power, other countries have narrowed the gap in key ways. It is not so much that the U.S. economy has declined as that the rest of the world is catching up. At the end of World War II, the U.S. produced roughly half the world's output with a tenth of the population. But given that Japan and Europe were devastated after the war, it was inevitable that our comparative lead would narrow. The productivity and standards of living of other countries have increased significantly as they have improved their education, labor skills, infrastructure, and technology. During the 1980s, Japanese productivity increased about 20% compared to 4% in the U.S. and in many key areas now exceeds ours. The overwhelming U.S. technological superiority has vanished.

In addition, America's economic policies of the 1980s have produced an economy in apparent good health when measured by current indicators such as the growth of employment or consumption. Yet, because we have failed to take a long-term perspective on our economy, our future productivity and international competitiveness are in doubt. Large federal deficits and a wave of private borrowing have tilted national spending toward consumption and away from investment in our future. Americans continue to consume more than they produce and save very little of what they earn. The United States, in 1981 the world's largest creditor, is now its largest debtor. We are losing control of our economic future, as control of our exchange rates and interest rates shifts into the hands of our foreign creditors.

WHAT STEPS ARE NEEDED

The sheer size of our economy means that the U.S. is likely to remain the world's largest producer for some time. In addition, our country has an enormous capacity for self-renewal and innovation, given our national commitment to economic competition, social mobility, immigration, and equal opportunity. Yet our future leadership in some key areas, particularly productivity, may be in question. We should be skeptical of projections of "convergence"—the view that Japan, Germany, and others will slow down as they catch up with the U.S. and will never pass us.

The responsibility for productivity growth and the competiveness of American products rests primarily with U.S. business leaders, but several steps by the federal government are also important. First and foremost, we must eliminate the federal budget deficit, which is still hovering around $150 billion annually. Cutting the deficit can help bring interest rates down, which will lead to greater private investment in our economy. It will also mean a lower U.S. dollar on foreign exchange markets, thereby making our products more competitive overseas. The federal government can also help boost productivity through more public investment in infrastructure, education, research and development, and a sound environment. And increasing our national savings rate will expand the pool of funds available for investment—both public and private—in our country's future.

THE NATURE OF ECONOMIC COMPETITION

While we need to act now to improve our economic outlook, it is important to understand the nature of international economic competition. Economic competition differs fundamentally from military competition which is typically a zero or negative-sum game—when one person gains, someone else loses. Instead, economic prosperity abroad is not necessarily bad for the U.S. Prosperity abroad puts the U.S. in a position to import superior technology to boost our productivity and improve our standard of living faster than if our economy remainded isolated. In addition, the prosperity of Japan and Europe gives us affluent partners with whom to share international responsibilities and means larger markets for U.S. products.

What this means is that, from the standpoint of our standard of living, our general goal should be more to make the U.S. do well than to triumph over other countries. The adage "it doesn't matter whether you win or lose but how you play the game" comes close to the truth. The policies that make our economy stronger will serve us well regardless of how well other economies perform. Short-signted U.S. economic policy is more of a threat to our economic future than what happens in other countries.

The United States is the world's largest and richest country, but to maintain our vigor and to ensure continued prosperity we have to get our economic house in order, take a longer-term perspective, and save and invest more.

PAYING TRIBUTE TO FLORIDA HISPANIC FAMILY OF THE YEAR

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, April 26, 1990, the Hispanic American Family of the Year Foundation and their honorary national chairman, First Lady Barbara Bush will host the Second Annual Recognition and Scholarship Dinner for the Florida Hispanic Family of the Year. This is a national project of the Hispanic American Family of the Year Foundation.

The foundation activities are numerous and varied including four statewide family recognition programs and a family educational scholarship fund. In addition, they also sponsor several family fairs which provide health and employment services to the community. One of the most important events cosponsored by the foundation is a toy and foodbasket drive to assist over 5,000 families during the holiday season.

The dinner will be held at the James L. Knight Convention Center at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Miami while being televised on WSCV Channel 51. Local Miami personalities Jose Diaz-Balart of WTVJ 4 and Leticia Callava of WSCV 51 will be directors of ceremonies with entertainment provided by Ramiro Cervera Orchestra.

I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to the outstanding nominees. Nominees for the Florida Hispanic Family of the Year are Jose Antonio and Gloria Maria Alvarado of Miami, Osmundo and Consuelo Alvarez of Miami, Jorge and Isabella Azze of Miami Beach, Cristina De Arcos of Miami, and Arturo and Hilda De Leon of Homestead. Also nominated are Wilfredo and Tamara Gort of Miami, Janet Granell of Tampa, Rafael and Luisa Medina of Orland, Manuel Muniz Oliu of Miami, and Pedro and Norma Reboredo of West Miami. In additoin, the Diaz-Oliver family will be receiving the special Lifetime Achievement Award.

The work contributed by all these wonderful men and women is immeasurable. They, as well as the Hispanic American Family of the Year Foundation, all deserve special acknowledgement for their dedication to the Hispanic communities.

CONTRACT REFORM MUST CONTINUE

HON. CURT WELDON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, Congress has made considerable progress in the last few years cleaning up the defense contracting system. Still, as the article below indicates, we have not finished the job. There is still nothing in law which prevents those who defraud the Government from getting subcontract work.

I ask that this illuminating article from the New York Times be inserted in the RECORD. I hope after reading it, my colleagues will work with me to keep these kind of contractors out of the system—for good—by cosponsoring H.R. 4401.

REPORTS OF FAULTY SHUTTLE AND WEAPONS PARTS PROMPT U.S. INQUIRY

(By Jeff Gerth)

WASHINGTON, April 13.—A Federal investigation has begun into allegations that a Florida company provided faulty parts for the space shuttle program and numerous crucial weapons systems.

The company, Impala Electronics Inc. of Tampa, is being investigated on charges that it switched labels on resistors used to regulate currents in electronic control systems, resulting in the installation of inferior resistors.

A Pentagon memorandum issued last Oct. 16 and Federal officials said the "re-marking scheme" involved buying "inferior quality" resistors and then changing codings or markings on them meant to describe the component's history or reliability.

There is no evidence that the resistors have caused safety problems in past shuttle flights, including that of the Challenger, which exploded shortly after its launching on Jan. 28, 1986, killing the seven crew members aboard.

But when the space agency recently tested 10 Impala-supplied resistors that were in inventory, nine failed, officials said. Another test, of a main shuttle engine, proved satisfactory, so officials said they did not believe there was any danger to the shuttle missions.

3 AGENCIES INVOLVED IN INQUIRY

Impala and its president, Joseph A. Pistone, are the subject of a criminal investigation, according to the memorandum and to Federal law-enforcement officials who spoke on the condition that they not be identified. The investigation is being conducted by the Tampa office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Defense Department's Criminal Investigative Service and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Inspector General.

James T. Smith, a lawyer with the Philadelphia firm of Dilworth, Paxson, Kalish & Kauffman, who represents Impala, said, "It's inappropriate to comment about the criminal investigation."

Mr. Pistone did not respond to repeated messages that were left with his secretary in an effort to obtain comment. The secretary said he was out of town until next week.

Impala is not a direct customer of the Government, nor does it make the parts it sells. Instead, in a pattern common in the parts supply business, Impala distributes resistors made by other companies to Pentagon or space agency contractors or subcontractors. According to the memorandum, these companies include the McDonnell Douglas Corporation, Boeing, Raytheon, the Martin Marietta Corporation and Honeywell Inc.

VARIETY OF SHUTTLE FUNCTIONS

Honeywell provides electronic control systems for a variety of shuttle functions, including the main engine, said Tim Morin, a Honeywell spokesman. He said, "These black boxes have worked perfectly," but he could not identify which shuttle systems used resistors supplied by Impala.

Each space shuttle uses tens of thousands of resistors from a variety of manufacturers. Impala's specialized resistors are used in limited but more crucial electronic control functions.

Top officials at NASA, including its Inspector General, Bill D. Colvin, repeatedly warned the agency and the White House last year that there was inadequate supervision over contractors and subcontractors supplying fasteners and electronic components for use in flight vehicles. The problem, these reports said, have both financial and safety ramifications.

WILLINGNESS 'TO CUT CORNERS'

Howard Cox, the Pentagon's Deputy Inspector General for criminal investigation and policy, said a declining military budget generally meant that "a lot more people will be willing to cut corners" in the quality of their products.

At the same time, Mr. Cox said, the "Defense Department is placing more and more reliance on the quality-assurance procedures of contractors."

The Pentagon and NASA use many of the same contractors.

One reason for the proliferation of inferior parts, investigators said, is that the highly competitive market is characterized by price cutting. Investigators said companies turned to substandard products both as an immediate way to cut costs and to keep their customers well supplied, thereby maintaining their business with Federal agencies.

SAFETY ALERT CIRCULATED

A safety alert concerning Impala's "potentially defective resistors" was circulated in the Government on October 16, 1989, by the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, which said it found evidence of a "remarking scheme" after searching Impala's Tampa plant last year.

The alert and Federal officials said the specialized resistors are used not only on the space shuttle but also on the Pershing and MX missiles, the F-16 jet fighter and various military helicopters, some of which involve electronic control or black box applications.

Mr. Colvin, the space agency's inspector general, declined to comment on the Impala case. He said the agency had been strengthening its safety efforts, but he added, "Any time something fails nine out of 10 tests it concerns me."

The proliferation of mislabeled or counterfeit parts, especially electronic components and fasteners like bolts, is a growing concern that has prompted hundreds of investigations involving the Defense Department and NASA.

A number of companies have been convicted of supplying inferior products or failing to perform required tests. Earlier this week a Pentagon contractor and three individuals pleaded guilty in Federal District Court in Los Angeles to charges of failing to test bolts for use in combat aircraft.

These activities make it difficult to be certain of an item's reliability or testing history. Legislation intended to tighten standards in the fastener industry has been introduced by Representative John D. Dingell, a Michigan Democrat who is chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The bill, the proposed Fastener Quality Assurance Act, which is scheduled to be debated soon, calls for mandatory testing and certification of fasteners.

Thomas J. Talleur, the director of the Defense Criminal Investigative Service's product substitution program, said the kind of activities described in the Impala alert were common and becoming a growing problem.

Cases involving counterfeit or inferior electronic components outnumber any other type of criminal case being handled by the Pentagon's criminal investigators, he said. He said these cases account for 15 percent of the 500 investigations now being conducted by the Defense Criminal Investigative Service.

NASA EXPECTS MINIMAL DUST ON TELESCOPE

CAPE CANAVERAL, FL, April 13.—The $1.5 billion Hubble Space Telescope will get slightly more dusty as it awaits a new launching date on the space shuttle Discovery, but the amount of contamination is expected to be minimal, NASA said today.

"We've done all the cautionary things that we can," said Fred Wojtalik, a project manager for the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. "We're going to get some degradation. Some particles are going to come into the Hubble that we just can't avoid."

Scientists want no more than 5 percent of the surface of the telescope's 94-inch mirror, the finest ever made, covered with dust or other debris once the telescope reaches orbit, Mr. Wojtalik said.

A 2 percent rate of contamination was expected if the shuttle Discovery had lifted off Tuesday on schedule, he said. That is expected to rise to 2.1 percent—still well within limits—as a result of the delay until the new launching date, April 25.

Clean air was being circulated inside the Discovery's sealed payload bay today to reduce contamination of the telescope. The payload bay will be opened Saturday so the telescope's nickel-hydrogen batteries can be removed and taken to a Kennedy Space Center laboratory for recharging.

The launching was postponed four minutes before liftoff on Tuesday when one of the shuttle's three auxiliary power units failed. Technicians will replace the unit this weekend.

BIPARTISAN FOREIGN INVESTMENT LEGISLATION IS INTRODUCED

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman TAUZIN, Congressman BROOMFIELD, and I are introducing bipartisan legislation that will improve the data we currently collect on foreign investment. Senator EXON of Nebraska is introducing the same bill today in the Senate.

We urge our colleagues to cosponsor this bipartisan legislation, "the Foreign Investment Analysis Act of 1990." The data our Government currently collects is too imprecise to allow us to understand the extent of foreign investment in certain sectors of the economy and regions of the United States.

Our bill would improve the data currently collected by:

First, giving the Bureau of Economic Analysis [BEA], which has primary responsibility for collecting data on foreign direct investment, access to the Census Bureau's data on foreign direct investment; and second, requiring the Secretary of Commerce to report to Congress on the progress of the data exchange.

Our bill represents a bipartisan approach to a controversial issue. The bill improves the data we collect without threatening to restrict foreign investment. It meets the public interest of improved data but protects American jobs.

We urge our colleagues to become original cosponsors to our foreign investment bill. We have attached a section-by-section analysis of the bill. If you have any questions or would like to cosponsor our bill, contact me or have your staff call Justin Lilley of the Energy and Commerce Committee at 5-3641.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE LENT BILL ON FOREIGN INVESTMENT

Section 1 of the Lent Bill lists the short title as "The Foreign Investment Analysis Act of 1990."

Section 2 of the Lent Bill authorizes the Bureau of Census, which is the principal government data collecting agency, to provide data it collects to the Bureau of Economic Analysis (BEA). BEA is charged under the International Investment and Trade in Services Survey Act with responsibility to collect information concerning the operations of U.S. affiliates of foreign companies. This data sharing would allow BEA to verify its data against Census data. This would improve BEA's analyses of the operations of U.S. affiliates of foreign parents.

Census currently collects data on all United States business "enterprises" and "establishments." BEA, on the other hand, collects data on business enterprises that are foreign-owned but does not collect data on business establishments. A business enterprise is a separate business operation which may consist of one or more business establishments.

Collecting and maintaining data at the business enterprise level means that all activity of the enterprise is reported by the primary activity of that enterprise. Thus, for example, a foreign-owned petroleum enterprise may also have a subsidiary establishment that operates a biotechnology facility. BEA will report all the enterprise's activities under petroleum, which is the primary activity of the enterprise. In contrast, Census will have data at both the enterprise and establishment levels.

Census maintains establishment level data for all businesses operating in the U.S. through its Standard Statistical Establishment List (SSEL). Census would share this establishment level data by providing BEA access to the SSEL. Consequently, BEA would be able to publish more detailed industrial and regional data and analyses on foreign investment in the U.S.

Section 2 of the Lent Bill also requires both Census and BEA to operate under the same confidentiality requirements each agency presently maintains. Furthermore, this section strengthens existing penalties for those who violate these confidentiality requirements.

Section 3 of the Lent Bill requires the Secretary of Commerce to report to Congress on the progress of the data exchange. Specifically, this report will analyze the extent to which the data exchange provides a higher level of accuracy and a greater degree of analysis on foreign direct investment in the U.S.

HONORING THE 101ST AIRBORNE DIVISION SCREAMING EAGLE SPIRIT

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN, JR.

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, as the Nation's Capital prepares to host the reunions and conventions of 26 Airborne unit associations to celebrate the 50th anniversary of U.S. Airborne forces, I commend the 101st Airborne Division Association to the 101st Congress.

There are real similarities in these two great institutions. The men of the 101st who jumped into the night skies of Normandy, defended Hell's Highway in Holland, held fast at frozen Bastogne, and defeated the North Vietnamese and Viet Cong in every battle they fought in Vietnam were brave and real patriots. I also believe that the 101st Congress has fought some hard battles, made some brave decisions, and that we exhibit active patriotism in our efforts to serve our constituents and country well.

This association of more than 5,000 "Screaming Eagle" veterans of the 101st Airborne Division in World War II, Vietnam, and active duty members of the 101st Airborne Division—air assault, the most powerful division in the world from the standpoint of firepower capability, stationed at Fort Campbell, KY—has its national headquarters in Sweetwater, TN, which is located in my congressional district.

The 101st Airborne Division Association is meeting to celebrate the 45th Annual Gathering of the Eagles in Washington, DC, July 5 through July 8. The association was formed in Berchtesgaden, Germany, in 1945 by Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor and has met for an annual reunion each year since its formation.

The objective of the 101st Airborne Division Association is to preserve in patriotic reverence the memory of those who served in the 101st Airborne Division; to support and enhance the fame and glory of the division; to maintain and strengthen the bonds of comradeship which distinguished the members of the division; to provide for the gathering and dissemination of information concerning these veterans and active duty members; to provide for their patriotic assembly in local and national reunions and to perpetuate "the Screaming Eagle Spirit" as to heritage and tradition for future generations.

DIMAGGIO'S HOMETOWN PITCHES BOCCIE, NOT BASEBALL

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the traditional Italian sport of boccie is rapidly becoming a popular pasttime throughout the United States, and nowhere is the passion for boccie more established, or more enthusiastic, than in my hometown, Martinez, CA.

As the Los Angeles Times recently noted, Martinez is rightly revered worldwide as the birthplace of the martini and the hometown of Joe DiMaggio. But as the Nation's unofficial boccie capital, Martinez is helping to introduce to Americans an ancient sport that is enjoyed by millions throughout the world.

Ken Dothee, a Martinez attorney, serves as the president of the U.S. Boccie Federation, and is one of several Martinez residents who have represented our country in international boccie competition. With the recognition of boccie by the International Olympics Committee, we are hopeful that the city will soon be able to boast several boccie Olympians as residents in 1992.

I know that the House will join me in paying tribute to Ken Dothee, Donna Allen, Nicolo Ditullio, Joe Aviana, Tommy Balistrieri, Leo Moro, and hundreds of other Martinez boccie players—as well as thousands more throughout Contra Costa County and the bay area. I am also including a recent story about the resurgence of boccie—and Martinez, CA's leading role in its revival—which appeared in the Los Angeles Times.

[From the Los Angeles Times, Apr. 3, 1990]

DIMAGGIO'S HOMETOWN PITCHES BOCCIE, NOT BASEBALL

(By Charles Hillinger)

MARTINEZ, CA.—This historic town on Carquinez Strait, 32 miles northeast of San Francisco, where John Muir hung his hat the last 24 years of his life, is the birthplace of the martini and the hometown of Joe DiMaggio.

It's also the boccie ball capital of America.

There are more players of old Italian bowling game per square foot in Martinez, population 28,000, than anywhere else in the country. The town has the largest organized boccie league in the United States, 123 teams with more than 1,200 regular players.

Ken (Barbarossa) Dothee, 44, a local public defender and former Martinez City Councilman, is president of the U.S. Boccie Federation. His Italian nickname means Red Beard. He's not Italian. He is of German descent.

United States Boccie, the official magazine of the game, is published here. Donna Allen, 45, like Dothee, one of the town's better players, is the publication's editor. She works for the Contra Costa County Planning Commission. She isn't Italian, either.

National boccie championships have been held in the U.S. since 1979. The first two were in Las Vegas and Denver, but little Martinez had the third national championship in 1981 on the 12 permanent hard-compacted oyster shell courts at the town's Shoreline Park.

"Our courts make up the largest permanent boccie facility in America." Dothee said. "There's no other layout like this in America."

Here, league play goes on during the day and under lights at night.

"Boccie was a game played traditionally by older gentlemen in Italian communities all over the U.S.," Dothee said. "It caught on here in Martinez 15 years ago and the face of the sport hasn't been the same since."

Dothee said that men, women and children of all nationalities are playing the game now. New leagues are springing up all over, in California as well as the rest of the country.

Boccie dates to centuries before the birth of Christ. Julius Caesar and his soldiers lagged rocks at small target stones between campaigns. Boccie is the national sport of Italy and is popular as well in France, Switzerland, Yugoslavia and South America.

World championships have been held since 1950, with Italy winning most of the time, Dothee has accompanied the U.S. team to the world championships the last six years.

"Not as a player, but as a representative of the U.S. Boccie Federation," he said. "I'm a pretty good lagger, but nowhere good enough to be on a national or world championship team."

He has attended the world championships in Split, Yugoslavia; Melbourne, Monaco, Milan, Buenos Aires and Valparaiso, Chile.

Milan played host to the world championships last October when the best players from 24 nations competed. Players from five other countries—Morocco, Hungary, Luxembourg, Romania and the Soviet Union—planning to participate in this year's tournament in Sao Paulo, Brazil, were on hand as observers at Milan.

The U.S. team finished 13th in Milan, winning more games than it had in any previous world championships. The U.S. team also finished ahead of France, Germany, Spain, Belgium, Canada and Brazil, among other countries.

Four players from Martinez have played in world competition in previous years—Nicolo Ditullio, Joe Avina, Tommy Balistrieri and Leo Moro.

Boccie was recently recognized by the International Olympic Committee and its proponents hope it will be included as a demonstration sport at the 1992 Barcelona games.

"Andiamo, a giocare le boccie," announces the "commish," the team leader in Martinez when league play begins. It means, "Let's go, friends, and play boccie."

The courts at Shoreline park are 85 feet long, 12 feet wide. The boccie is a wood composition or metal ball, softball-size, rolled down the court at a pallino or jack, the golf ball-size target ball. The object is to roll the boccie as close to the pallino as possible.

In team play, eight balls are used, two per competitor. Points are scored for each team's throws closer to the pallino than the opponent's. Players also try to knock the other team's balls away from the pallino.

"In international play, a player will call his shot, designate which ball he wants to hit," Dothee said. "The player runs up to a line and lofts the ball 60 to 70 feet through the air and must hit the pallino or an opponent's ball on the fly. It's like making a three-point basket-ball shot."

He mentioned the Italian superstar of boccie, a player named Granaglia.

"He is the Babe Ruth of boccie, a man in his 50s, a living legend who * * * doesn't need a first name. He has made over 100 consecutive airborne shots. Nobody else can do it like he can."

The Pope is a boccie player. So is Rudy Perpich, the longtime governor of Minnesota.

And, says Allen, "People from all walks of life play boccie in Martinez. We have teams with our generations of the same family. We have all-women teams in addition to the all-men teams. Teams with husbands and wives, neighbors, co-workers, judges and garbage men, secretaries, cops, teachers, lawyers, doctors."

Dothee, who spearheaded the boccie movement in Martinez, is a graduate of St. Mary's College in nearby Moraga. He is trying to get St. Mary's to become the first college in the country with boccie as a sponsored sport.

"As president of the U.S. Boccie Federation, established in 1977, my main job is to coordinate activities, to promote boccie, to get it accepted as a high school sport," he said. "Boccie is in its adolescence in America. Our goal is to change that, to put it right up there with golf and tennis."

Dothee was introduced to the game as a youngster.

"When I was a kid in San Francisco and rode my bike to the pier to go fishing. I'd pass the boccie courts on the waterfront. I was fascinated by the old men speaking a foreign language [Italian], bowling the balls and smoking cigars that smelled awful."

Eventually, he took up the game himself and in 1975 he and several others formed the first league in Martinez with eight teams.

Cafe Romano on Martinez's Main Street is the gathering place for boccie players and league officials. Downtown Martinez is a quaint, turn-of-the-century business section. The town is filled with Victorian homes. It was named after Don Ignacio Martinez who had 11 children and 17,000 acres here when California was part of Mexico.

During the Gold Rush of 1848, miners would stop off in Martinez and drink something called the Martinez Special, a local concoction made of one part very dry sauterne wine and three parts gin. It was stirred in the ice and finished with an olive. Over the years the Martinez Special became the martini special, then simply the martini.

Italian fishermen, including Joe DiMaggio's father, arrived shortly after the Gold Rush and kept their fishing fleets here. There is a Joe DiMaggio street in Martinez and a Joe DiMaggio baseball park next to the boccie courts. Fisherman's Park is named in honor of the Italian fishermen of Martinez and, appropriately, is on Berrellessa Street.

A famous Italian restaurant in Manhattan, Vagabondo, has had boccie courts for years. So has Boccie Cellar in Santa Cruz where, since the 1930s, enthusiasts have played on its two courts.

"We have to kick the players out nearly every night when the place closes at 2 a.m.," says owner Larry Behman.

The San Francisco law firm of Coblentz, Cahen, McCabe & Breyer calls its boccie court on the seventh floor rooftop of their office building the highest boccie court on earth.

"The sport is a comer," Allen said. "We estimate that at least 1 million Americans play the game."

Said Al Milano, a Martinez surveyor: "Boccie is like abalone and calamari. [Once,] only the Italians knew about it. Now, it's becoming popular all over the place."

LEGISLATION TO CHANGE THE FEDERAL TAXATION OF LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, today I join TOM DOWNEY in introducing legislation to change the Federal taxation of life insurance companies. Our legislation builds on the evolving consensus that section 809 of the Internal Revenue Code is inequitable and simply does not accurately reflect the economic income of life insurance companies.

In 1984, the Congress passed legislation which sought to tax mutual and stock life insurance companies on their economic income (defined as taxable gain from operations). Full economic income for mutual life companies was supplemented by a differential amount determined under section 809.

Section 809, which applies only to mutual life companies, imputes and adds to the taxable income of each mutual a "differential earnings amount." This amount is determined by multiplying a specified industry base rate of return (the "differential earnings rate") by each mutual's "average equity base."

The section 809 add-on to mutuals' taxable income was believed to be necessary in order to maintain so-called segment balance. This was an effort to assure that neither the stocks nor the mutuals would derive an unfair advantage from the 1984 tax law changes.

Despite these laudable intentions, section 809 has not worked. Recent studies by the General Accounting Office and the Department of the Treasury conclude that section 809 is cumbersome and ineffective tax policy. In fact, the economic income of mutual companies can be accurately measured for Federal tax purposes if premium payments and capital contributions are included in the mutual life company's income, even though the policyholder payments are deductible.

With this in mind, our bill would repeal section 809, replacing that section with a tax on the equity return of both stock and mutual life companies which write participating policies. This tax would not fall on the policyholder but rather would take the form of a proxy tax paid by the life company paying a dividend on the participating business.

In addition, our legislation would require life companies to amortize a portion of deferred acquisition costs (basically agents' commissions, which are currently immediately deductible). Requiring such a deferral is consistent with generally accepted income tax accounting principals which require a close match of expenses incurred in creating an asset and any income derived from the creation of that asset.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation marks a move toward tax simplification in the life insurance taxation area. Our bill also achieves tax fairness; by taxing the equity return of both stock and mutual companies, arbitrary add-on taxes which bear little relation to economic performance or to tax policy are eliminated from the Tax Code.

KIDS SPEAK FOR THEMSELVES ABOUT DRUG ABUSE

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, in the past few months many of us have received letters from seventh and eighth graders about important issues of concern to them as part of the Respect Teen Speak for Yourself curriculum program.

The greatest concern among the young people who wrote to Members of Congress is drug abuse. About 17 percent of the letters written to us focused on this subject. In most of the letters I received, the young authors spoke about the need to create better education programs in our schools to slow the demand for drugs.

It is reassuring to know that our young people are seriously thinking about the drug crisis and developing alternatives for resolving it. Now, more than ever, Congress needs to listen to the Nation's children, the ones who have the most to lose from drugs, about how best to eliminate their use.

I would like to share with my colleagues one of the letters which I received about this subject. It was written by Christina Hsu from Fremont, CA, who was selected as the Speak for Yourself district finalist from my area. Christina eloquently expresses the need to stop demand for drugs, which she believes can be accomplished through effective education programs.

The text of the letter follows:

Drug abuse is a major problem in schools all over the United States, and although the government is trying to stop drugs from entering the country, I think it would be more effective to stop the demand instead of the supply, so that drug dealers will find fewer customers.

A good way to do this would be to improve and expand drug education programs going on in our schools right now—especially in areas which need them, such as lower class areas in big cities. Also, not only should they be told to "just say no", but also good ways to say it.

Another important factor is the speaker in a drug education program. Although Nancy Reagan meant well when she said "just say no", some black kid in a slum isn't going to identify with an upper class white woman. The people who speak out in drug education programs should be people who the audience trusts to know something of the subject, like someone who used to be addicted to drugs. Since peer pressure is the cause for many a teenage drug habit, it would be nice if instead, peers would give a more positive kind of pressure, to steer kids away from drugs. In other words, there should be programs in which students who had a lot of influence use their influence to encourage their peers not to use drugs.

I hope these steps will be taken to keep kids off drugs, one of the most serious problems in this country.

I applaud Christina for the good sense of her thoughtful letter. All of us can learn something from her comments.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for Wednesday, April 18, 1990, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION POLICY

Last month President Bush unveiled a national transportation policy that is designed to provide a blueprint for tackling the transportation challenges of the 1990s and beyond. The President's policy was released against a backdrop of growing criticism of the current state of the U.S. transportation system. Traffic jams, flight delays, deteriorating bridges and roads, urban smog—all threaten the quality of life and our nation's ability to compete. The increasing gridlock gives urgency to transportation problems.

Scope of the Problems: Transportation activities are a critical part of the U.S. economy. It is estimated that one of every ten jobs in the U.S. is in transportation or transport-related business, and that transportation products and services comprise almost one-fifth of the gross national product. The national transportation sector is enormous, covering over 2.2 million miles of paved highways, 150,000 miles of private railroad track, 26,000 miles of commercially navigable inland and coastal waterways, 5,700 public use airports, and 80,000 buses in local transit service.

The problems facing this system are as daunting. The President's report found that 42% of the nation's highway bridges are structurally deficient or obsolete; 65% of peak-hour travel on urban interstate highways was congested in 1987; and 21 primary airports each have more than 20,000 hours of flight delays a year. Indiana residents confront these kinds of problems every day—whether sitting in traffic jams outside Jeffersonville, encountering potholes on rural routes, or looking for detours around bridges closed for renovation or repair.

President's Proposal: The President's proposal is an attempt to provide a national framework for meeting transportation needs. The plan envisions a national transportation network that is more integrated and efficient, providing connections between rural and urban areas, between ports and inland points, and between different modes of transportation, such as airports and highways. The plan sees the federal government's role in that policy as setting the broad agenda, and providing those services that it alone can provide, such as air traffic control. It lets others make the decisions and, by and large, provide the funds. The plan concludes that the main providers of public transport services are the state and local governments, and that transportation policy should be made away from Washington.

President Bush is to be commended for thinking long term about the national transportation problems. There is little doubt that the transport system needs a lot of work. What is missing from his plan is a federal commitment to follow through on his broad proposals. The President says that no industry in the nation is more important to U.S. economic growth and international competitiveness than transportation. But his challenge is not to the federal government but to the states, localities, private industry, and users of the transport system.

It is not clear to me just what the role of the federal government is in the President's report. There are very few commitments to specific projects and even fewer dollars. The policy mainly sets out a collection of broad principles. It says that states will be expected to shoulder a larger share of the highway program; it encourages deregulation and the use of the price merchanism where possible; and it promotes user fees as an excellent way to raise revenues. Beyond that, the policy represents a retreat from the traditional federal role in supporting infrastructure investment.

Funding Shortfall: The President may be right in saying that the states and local governments are not doing enough, but the long-term recent trends show that the cost of infrastructure has been increasingly borne by state and local governments. One study has found that in 1980, the federal share of highway and mass transit funding was 34% higher than the state and local share; in 1990, state and local investment is projected to exceed federal investment by 63%. Indiana is planning to spend $4 billion over the next ten years to make improvements in the state's transportation system.

The President's policy would continue to shift more of the financial burden of mass transit, highway, and airport projects to the people who use them and to state and local governments. The transportation plan calls for increased user fees on aviation fuels and shipping to help defray the cost of airport improvements. It would also permit states to raise additional revenues through tolls on federal-aid highways and airport passenger user fees. Many state and local government officials complain that these proposals will not suffice, and that they will be forced to raise taxes locally to meet transportation needs. After a decade of rising state gasoline taxes, state lawmakers are wary of squeezing more tax dollars out of their constituents.

Federal Role: My guess is that most people expect the federal government to take the lead on transportation programs. More federal revenues could come from the multi-billion dollar trust funds made up of fees collected from users of the transportation system and earmarked for federal aid programs. In recent years, the government has built up large surpluses in the trust funds, which have helped reduce the size of the federal budget deficit. The highway trust fund now runs a $10 billion surplus; the aviation trust fund, an $8 billion surplus. Transportation advocates would rather spend down these surpluses to meet transportation needs than impose another round of gasoline tax increases.

My own view is that the crisis in transportation, which is well documented by the President's policy report, will require more national action and more national investment than the President suggests. The states can and should help, but they cannot replace effective action by Washington. In many respects the President's transportation plan is not a federal policy at all. Rather it devolves to the states the responsibility of ensuring the soundness of the transportation system and the economic viability of the country. If the country's transportation system is in the national interest, and I think it is, then the federal government cannot stick the states and localities with the bill.

DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE, 1990

HON. ILEANA ROS-LEHTINEN

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Ms. ROS-LEHTINEN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I had the privilege of attending the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council's Annual National Civic Commemoration of the Days of Remembrance. Set in the heart of the Capitol's rotunda, the ceremony depicted the persecution of a race, never to be forgotten.

The memory of the Holocaust should live on forever, so that this generation and the next generation to come should never be subject to a Holocaust again. Cities all over the world observed Yom Hashoa—Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes Remembrance Day.

The commeration in my district was held at Miami Beach's Holocaust Memorial and called "Unto Every Person There Is a Name," which centered on reading the names and the sites of each individual's birth and death. Dade County, FL, was assigned to honor victims whose last names begun with the letter "K." And other cities throughout the State and nationwide were given different names, all of which were researched and compiled by Jerusalem's Yad Vashem Holocaust Institute.

In light of this, I would like to share with my colleagues a story that was presented at the Days of Remembrance ceremony.

FORTY-FIVE YEARS AGO

In the waning days of the triumphant march toward Berlin, American soldiers entered a strange universe—the Nazi concentration camps. Dachau Mauthausen, Ohrdurf, Nordhausen—these were not ordinary stops in the march to victory.

Battle weary veterans, hardened by months of military action, thought they had seen the worst. These men were by no means innocent. They had seen the ravages of war; they had felt the loss of comrades who perished in battle; they had killed enemy soldiers in some of the fiercest fighting in human welfare. And yet, when they entered these camps, they discovered a world beyond their imagination—the piles of corpses of those who had been murdered; the living skeletons of those who had endured; and everywhere, the stench of death.

On April 12, 1945, the very day that President Franklin Delano Roosevelt died, General's Dwight D. Eisenhower, Omar N. Bradley and George S. Patton entered Ohrdurf. General Eisenhower immediately turned pale but insisted on seeing the entire camp. General Patton excused himself, went behind a building and became sick. A group of inmates guided them through a scene where, in General Bradley's words, "death had become so fouled by degradation that it both stunned and numbed us."

General Eisenhower declared: "We are told that the American soldier does not know what he is fighting for. Now, at least, he will know what he is fighting against." Grasping the future significance of this situation, Eisenhower summoned the press and a Congressional delegation to tour Ohrdurf. Later he said: "I felt that the evidence shoud be placed before the American and British public in a fashion that would leave no room for cynical doubt." To General George C. Marshall, he wrote: "I have reported what I saw and what I heard, but only part of it. For most of it, I have no words."

The entry of American troops into the concentration camps may have heralded the end of an extraordinary nightmare; but for the survivors, it marked the beginning of their long struggle to reenter the world of ordinary, daily existence. The most critical immediate needs for the thousands who had managed to keep alive were food, medical care and compassion. In the longer term, these concentration camp inmates became displaced persons. Their families were lost, homes destroyed, communities decimated. They were unwanted in the lands of their birth. The American Army, trained for combat, took upon itself another task—to nurture the survivors' return to life.

When survivor and liberator met, hope and freedom embraced. Then, as now, the response of the survivor was gratitude. And for the soldier, the responsibility was, and is, to bear witness.

OUR COUNTRY'S HERITAGE! A LEGACY OF FREEDOM

HON. CURT WELDON

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to honor a young girl from Pennsylvania's Seventh Congressional District, Amy Schwab. Amy is in the eighth grade at Ashland Middle School in Darby Township. She has won the American Legion Essay Award for her paper on "Our Country's Heritage." I am proud to have Amy as one of my constituents and congratulate her on her fine work. I would like to share this outstanding essay with my colleagues.

OUR COUNTRY'S HERITAGE! A LEGACY OF FREEDOM

(By Amy Schwab)

Throughout many years, our freedom has not changed. Like the fleeting youth of a young woman that she tries to keep, past citizens of the United States have tried to protect the freedoms that every present citizens enjoys.

When another nation or individual threatens any rights we have, the bravest men of our country fight them. Though many men had no choice, every one felt a deep down loyalty to do what was right-fight to regain the freedom they lost.

After the Revolutionary War, the country's wisest leaders got together and produced the Constitution. Even the changes our young country has gone through, the flexible Constitution has only had twenty-six changes.

Nothing has ever happened to repeat the days right after the Revolutionary War. The slavery issue was way out of hand but Abraham Lincoln came along and sorted out our problems. When he granted the slaves freedom, he granted everyone freedom from bondage.

Even during the World Wars, America tried to stay neutral. But when worst came to worst, our bravest people went forth-on to victory. With the thought of freedom for all people in mind, these men served their country unselfishly.

At times, one takes his freedom for granted. How many times does a person read the Bible, attend church, go to a political rally, or even write and editorial? These opportunities are scarce in many nations. In communist countries, someone could be arrested just for speaking their mind in a political event. But those are rights that are natural for me to enjoy.

The good, old, reliable Constitution has led us through times of war and peace and trial and triumph. Unlike the trend today, our government is not in chaos. I thank our American heritage, the men who fought, and God for my legacy of freedom.

APRIL 25 IS SECRETARY DAY

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, today, April 25, is Secretaries Day, honoring professional secretaries and their outstanding contributions to America's government and business. I'd like to take a moment to offer my own words of appreciation for these hard-working individuals whose diligence in administration and attention to detail result in the smooth, efficient, and effective operation of any office.

Secretaries have earned distinction for their dedication to meeting the highest in professional standards in the performance of their duties. Often, they work right alongside the presidents of major corporations and serve as a liaison between management, clients, and the public. Many become proficient in a specialized field, such as law, accounting, or government. I personally rely heavily on my secretarial staff for their loyalty, skills, and efficiency in managing my office and meeting the needs of my constituents.

Today, more than ever, the secretarial profession offers exciting career challenges and opportunities for advancement. The Professional Secretaries International Association [PSIA] has done an outstanding job in its campaign to seek recognition for secretaries as well as promoting the many job opportunities available to qualified candidates.

I'm proud to join in today's tribute and congratulate the PSIA and its members. They're a credit to their profession.

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL TO ENCOURAGE EQUITY IN FEDERAL PAY REFORM

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation which will help correct the inequity of the President's Federal pay reform proposals. This bill would grant a pay raise to the Federal employees of Monterey County equal to the pay raise proposed for Federal employees in counties within the San Francisco metropolitan statistical area.

As you know, there are gross disparities between the salaries of public sector and private-sector employees. The President's Commission on Federal Pay Reform recently reported that Federal pay falls short of private sector pay by an average of 28 percent. It should be no wonder that the Government is losing the best and the brightest to nongovernment jobs; those who have stayed in the Federal work force have had to pay more than their fair share of the cost of reducing the Federal deficit.

To address this problem, President Bush has proposed raising the salaries of Federal employees in the New York, San Francisco, and Los Angeles metropolitan statistical areas by 8 percent. This proposal, however, is inadequate—not only in degree, but also in design. It arbitrarily includes those counties within the bounds of three MSA's and leaves out many other areas of the country where competing salaries are just as high. The bill I am introducing today would extend the 8 percent to Monterey County, an area just outside the San Francisco MSA with a very high cost of living.

Eventually it will be necessary to increase the salaries and benefits of all Federal employees so that it is not necessary for people to choose between civil service and the needs of their families. To attract and retain qualified personnel, we must turn toward the broader concept of locality pay—scaling Federal pay to comparable private sector salaries within a given area. If it is necessary, however, to pass an emergency measure, the plan should recognize the true emergency. Expensive areas such as Monterey should not be excluded simply because they are less populous. I urge my colleagues to join with me in efforts to erase this inequity.

The bill follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) subchapter VII of chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following: "§ 5376. Higher pay based on locality

"(a) For the purpose of this section, the term 'statutory pay system' has the meaning given such term by section 5301(c) (and includes the pay system under chapter 54).

"(b) Effective for pay periods beginning on or after January 1, 1991—

"(1) the rate of basic pay for any employee under a statutory pay system who is employed within Monterey County, California, shall be equal to 108 percent of the rate of basic pay which would otherwise apply, subject to paragraph (2); and

"(2) the maximum rate of basic pay payable to any employee under this section shall be equal to 108 percent of the maximum rate allowable under section 5308.

"(c) The Office of Personnel Management shall prescribe regulations necessary for the administration of this section, including regulations for determining where an individual is employed.

"(d) For purposes of section 5303, rates of pay established under this section may be taken into account to such extent as the President (or the Office of Personnel Management or other agency, as applicable) considers appropriate."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of sections for chapter 53 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding after the item relating to section 5375 the following:

"5376. Higher pay based on locality."

THE FAMILY AND MEDICAL LEAVE ACT, H.R. 770—PART III

HON. TIMOTHY J. PENNY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. PENNY. Mr. Speaker, today I conclude a series of extensions devoted to an examination of H.R. 770, the Family and Medical Leave Act, with statements from the small business community and the Bush administration. As the engine of job growth and opportunity for many Americans, I remain hopeful that the concerns of America's small employers, expressed in the statements that follow, will be considered during debate on H.R. 770.

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS,
Washington, DC, February 7, 1990.

Hon. TIMOTHY J. PENNY,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR TIM: In an era when Americans believe that the nation is falling behind in world economic competition, some in the Congress are still pushing for enactment of broad mandates—particularly mandated parental and medical leave or mandated maternity leave.

Foisting mandated parental and medical leave on small business is simply following the path of European economies. In the past decade, European job creation and economic growth has been stagnate. This is in large part due to the imposition of mandated benefits—mandates which stifle expansion, apply growth caps on businesses, and actually create hiring disincentives.

Mandated parental and medical leave benefits are not free. They cost small business in lost productivity, lost flexibility, and force trade-offs between other fringe benefits.

Moreover, mandates particularly mandated parental and medical leave or mandated maternity leave, hurt small business. They:

Disproportionately impair small firms. Small businesses employ the majority of young single workers and more senior workers—the same workers who would be unable to take advantage of the mandated leave.

Leave the small business bare. Small firms do not have legions of replacement workers to take the place of the on-leave employee.

Adversely affect small business productivity by allowing 40 weeks of leave over a 2-year period.

Opposition to mandated parental and medical leave legislation is one of the small business community's top priorities. It was the number two priority of the 1986 White House Conference on Small Business. Small business remains firmly opposed to H.R. 770 and to mandated maternity leave benefits.

Mandated benefits hurt small business and hurt the economy.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. MOTLEY III,
Vice President,
Federal Government Relations.

SMALL BUSINESS LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL,
February 26, 1990.

Hon. TIMOTHY J. PENNY,
U.S. House of Representatives, 436 Cannon House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PENNY: Recent major media reports have indicated that "The legislative battle over parental leave is heating up." Commentators have spoken of this issue as "on a legislative fast track" or even a "rush to judgment." The legislation receiving this new attention is the Family and Medical Leave Act, H.R. 770.

H.R. 770 represents a broad governmental intrusion into the traditional balanced employer-employee determination of proper and fair conditions of employment. More specifically, the bill:

(1) Mandates employers to provide 10 weeks of employee leave for newborn or adopted children as well as seriously ill children or parents every two years.

(2) Mandates employers to provide 15 weeks of leave for a serious personal illness or injury every year.

(3) Mandates that employers maintain health benefits for any employee on leave under its provisions.

(4) Mandates that employers guarantee all covered employees equivalent or similar employment once leave has been completed.

(5) Sets employer exemption standards which are totally unrealistic and inadequate.

The Small Business Legislative Council urges you to oppose any legislative intrusion into the work place as represented by the provisions of H.R. 770. The Small Business Legislative Council (SBLC) is a permanent, independent coalition of over one hundred trade and professional associations that share a common commitment to the future of small business. Our members represent the interests of over four million small businesses in manufacturing, retailing, distribution on, professional and technical services, construction, transportation and agriculture. While our policies are developed through consensus among our membership, we respect the right of individual associations to express their own views. For your information, a list of our members is enclosed.

First, as a member of principle, SBLC strongly believes that Congress should not seek to dictate specific employee benefits and levels which an employer can and cannot provide. To do so undermines the voluntary, flexible, and comprehensive benefit system which has been developed by the private sector. Such a system has served this nation, its business community, and its workers well ever since its inception. To seriously tamper with its fundamentals will put us on a course leading to the erosion or even destruction of the entire system.

Second, it is important to recognize the enactment of laws such as H.R. 770 poses very special threats to the American small business community. For a small business, regulations, covering only one or two employees, may dramatically alter both daily and long-term operations. Under these circumstances, the economic costs imposed by this bill cannot be absorbed. To be specific, H.R. 770:

(1) Destroys the valuable flexibility which now exists between employers and employees to creatively tailor benefit structures to individual and company needs.

(2) Creates dangerous "tradeoff" conditions in which employers may be required, as a matter of practical economics, to sacrifice valuable worker-preferred benefits in order to pay for or compensate for the congressionally imposed costs or mandated parental leave.

(3) Imposes conditions of "guaranteed" employment and/or benefit which would greatly impede an employer's ability to plan his operations with emphasis upon cost minimization and absence of disruption.

(4) Sets a precedent for future unwanted governmental imposition and regulation of employee benefits.

In conclusion, H.R. 770 can have a devastating impact upon small businesses in every part of our nation. Its imposition of unwarranted employee hiring, training, maintenance, insurance, and replacement costs will adversely affect the competitive abilities of the American economic system. Legislation such as H.R. 770 deserves to be placed not on a "fast track" but rather on a "dead end."

Sincerely,

THOMAS K. ZAUCHA,
Chairman.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
SECRETARY OF LABOR,
Washington, DC, March 2, 1990.

Hon. TIMOTHY J. PENNY,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR TIM: H.R. 770, the "Family and Medical Leave Act," may soon be considered by the House. I have enclosed a summary of this bill for your review. As you consider your position on this controversial legislation, I would like to share the Administration's position with you.

The Administration strongly believes that time off for a child's birth, adoption or illness is a worthy benefit for employers to offer to employees. We also strongly believe that sick leave, pregnancy leave or disability leave for employees are worthy benefits, and time off to care for a sick parent or parent-in-law or grandparent is an important benefit. But this Administration strongly objects to the principle that the Federal government should mandate leave policy for the nation's workforce.

Over the past year, I have reviewed the state of American workers and their needs as well as the needs of our employers who are competing in a rapidly changing and increasingly global economy. I have outlined an extensive agenda involving workplace skills, job training, health and safety, pension reform, strengthened affirmative action efforts and increased family responsive policies. I intend to use my position as Secretary of Labor to bring home the message to more employers that they are the primary beneficiaries when they adopt flexible policies and benefits that allow workers to respond to family responsibilities. I encourage you and your colleagues in the House to join me in this challenging and worthwhile endeavour.

Encouraging flexibility in the workplace though, is a far different approach than imposing a rigid Federal mandate on a significant number of employers. H.R. 770 would require that leave be given for the birth, adoption or illness of a parent or child, as well as for personal medical reasons. Yet, time off to care for a sick spouse, an ill aunt or uncle, or an important friend to the family may be just as critical to one employee as the leave benefits in H.R. 770 may be for another employee. Providing paid leave, even if it would be for a shorter time period, may be more important in many instances than the lengthy, unpaid leaves required in H.R. 770. Similarly, providing child care may be a critical benefit to some. It is fair to conclude that a newly imposed federally-mandated leave requirement might negatively affect existing benefits as employers search for ways to pay for and accommodate the requirements in H.R. 770.

I would draw your attention to the fact that increasing numbers of employers are recognizing the benefits of voluntarily adopting family responsive benefits. Some of the most recent include: E.I. du Point de Nemours Corporaton, Boeing Aircraft Company, the Marriott Corporation, and Tenneco Inc. And, I'm sure that you could probably add more examples of innovation and responsiveness from both small and large businesses from your own District.

My commitment, and that of the President, to improving the work/family balancing challenge is deep. The President has proposed a major child care initiative and the largest increase in history for the Head Start program, which can help parents meet their child care needs.

In addition, in January 1989, the Department of Labor created the Work and Family Clearinghouse, housed in the Womens' Bureau. The Clearinghouse is a computerized database designed to provide employers with information and technical assistance on the child care, flexible leave and flexible benefit options that are available to assist their employees to balance their work and family responsibilities. Since January, 1989, the Clearinghouse has responded to over 2500 inquiries. In October, 1989, a toll-free number was established for the Clearinghouse (1-800-827-5335). In addition, an elder care section of the database is being developed and is expected to be operational in June, 1990. If you or your staff would care to tour the Clearinghouse, please contact the Women's Bureau directly at 523-6611.

By imposing Federal mandates on certain leave policies such as those contained in H.R. 770, we may inadvertently and negatively influence the delicate, individual balance that lies at the heart of work and family flexibility and the entire system of voluntarily provided employee benefits. Should this legislation or any other legislation to mandate leave policies be sent to the President, I would be compelled to recommend a veto of such legislation.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this report to the Congress and that enactment of H.R. 770, or any other mandatory leave legislation, would not be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

ELIZABETH DOLE.

A TRIBUTE TO BARBARA J. MILLIFF

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, May 3, 1990, the We Care Treatment Center in Concord, CA, will honor Barbara J. Milliff, its exective director who has recently retired after 25 years of dedicated service to developmentally delayed infants and children in Contra Costa County.

Since 1965, Barbara has been the driving force behind the growth in services offered by the We Care Treatment Center. Through her leadership, We Care has grown from a small center treating only a few delayed and disabled children a year to a center which is now equipped to serve as many as 140 children annually. Over the years Barbara has been closely involved with a number of patients and their families. Her sensitivity and devotion to their needs earned her their trust and confidence. She also gained the respect of her colleagues, the center's volunteers, and numerous community groups and their representatives.

Barbara has developed and implemented many of the programs currently available through the We Care Treatment Center. These include an intern program that offers disadvantaged teenagers a work/learn experience, parent education and therapy for dysfunctional families, treatment for drug-affected or neglected children, and the first Contra Costa County home-based treatment program for handicapped and disadvantaged infants. For 20 years, she has creatively utilized donated time, labor, and community help to efficiently maintain the center's buildings and facilities.

In addition to these responsibilities, Barbara has also served on over 17 committees working in the best interest of children and has been actively involved in lobbying local and State legislators on children's issues.

On May 3, 1990, Barbara's 25 years of tireless efforts will be recognized by her colleagues and friends. In honor of her contributions to the community and her commitment to disabled children and families, the board of directors of the We Care Treatment Center has established the Barbara J. Milliff Tribute Fund to construct new facilities to treat emotionally disturbed and delayed 4- and 5-year-old children.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that my colleagues in the House of Representatives join me in acknowledging the distinguished career of Barbara J. Milliff. I would like to congratulate Barbara for 25 years of outstanding service to the children of Contra Costa County and wish her the very best in her retirement.

EDWARDS HONORS FOUR CALIFORNIA NEWSPAPERS FOR THEIR PULITZER PRIZES

HON. DON EDWARDS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to congratulate and pay special tribute to four newspapers from California, all recipients of the 1990 Pulitzer Prizes. The San Jose Mercury News, the San Francisco Chronicle, the Oakland Tribune, and the Los Angeles Times have all provided exceptional journalistic coverage over the years, and I am happy to see them receive such distinguished recognition.

The Loma Prieta earthquake of October 17, 1989, was a truly catastrophic event which left thousands of people homeless and 68 people died. The earthquake also left people eager for information about its effect on the places and people close to them. Over 300 reporters, photographers, and editors worked on the earthquake coverage for the San Jose Mercury News. Even though the staff had to rely partly on emergency power, within 24 hours an extra 200,000 papers were published and distributed to the news-eager citizens of the bay area.

The staff of the Mercury News worked as a team, and under harsh circumstances, they were able to keep the public abreast of the important events that unfolded in the days following the quake. For their hard work and extensive coverage of the October 17 earthquake, the entire news staff of the San Jose Mercury News deservingly received the 1990 Pulitzer Prize for general news reporting.

The devastation of the Loma Prieta earthquake created images that will forever be a part of that ill-fated day. Many of those tragic images were captured on film by brave photographers who made sure that the destruction was seen by people around the world.

A team of seven photographers from the Oakland Tribune received the 1990 Pulitzer Prize for spot news photography for their coverage of the death and destruction of the October 17 earthquake. Of particular note was the photographic coverage that the Tribune gave to the collapsed Cypress Freeway, where 44 people lost their lives. I am glad to see that the exceptional photography of the crew of the Oakland Tribune is honored with a 1990 Pulitzer Prize.

In our great democracy it is important for people to have the right to be critical and to be able to freely express their views. The first amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantees the freedom of speech and freedom of the press to ensure that these ideals are made a reality. Each year a Pulitzer is awarded to a journalist who best demonstrates these important rights.

Allan Temko of the San Francisco Chronicle received the 1990 Pulitzer Prize for criticism because of his critical analysis of architecture and the environment. Mr. Temko has been with the Chronicle for almost 30 years, and along with his journalistic career, he has advised President John F. Kennedy and Governor Edmund G. Brown on the environment. No doubt this award will bring his knowledge and skills to the attention of others who can benefit from his insight.

Mr. Jim Murray has written a sports column for the Los Angeles Times for almost 30 years. During this time he has worked for Time and the magazine that went on to become Sports Illustrated. He has also received 14 National Sportswriter of the Year Awards, 12 of them consecutively.

Mr. Murray was honored with another distinguished award this year, the 1990 Pulitzer Prize for commentary. Mr. Murray has shown a wonderful blend of journalistic know-how and an unequalled knowledge of sports. I am glad to see Jim Murray of the Los Angeles Times receive a 1990 Pulitzer Prize.

Mr. Speaker, for their work in reporting the events that shape our society, the news staff of the San Jose Mercury News, Allan Temko of the San Francisco Chronicle, the photography staff at the Oakland Tribune, and Jim Murray of the Los Angeles Times all received 1990 Pulitzer Prizes. I am proud to salute these four California recipients of the 1990 Pulitzer Prize.

AMENDING THE INSPECTOR GENERAL ACT OF 1978

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a bill to return the responsibilities of inspectors general to the powers we envisioned when Public Law 94–452, the Inspector General Act, was passed in 1978.

This bill, which is also being introduced in the Senate by Mr. GLENN, was made necessary by a March 1989 ruling of the Department of Justice, Office of Legal Council [OLC] that unnecessarily curbed the inspectors generals' investigations into programs regulated by Federal agencies. When the act was passed in 1978, the IG's were given far-reaching powers to keep Federal agencies corruption free and efficiently operating. The OLC ruling reduced the power of the IG's. This bill would let Congress restore those powers.

The inspectors general and the problems they were created to combat—waste, fraud, and corruption—have long been an interest of mine.

As a member of the Massachusetts General Court, I helped create the first ERISA law over 36 years ago. That law served as a model for the Federal ERISA laws now enforced by the Department of Labor. It also taught me about the danger of wrongdoing in government programs.

Since then I've never forgotten the impact of corruption and fraud on working people. It's hard to forget about benefit payments to dental programs that didn't exist. And working folk who lost their retirement savings because pension plan managers were lining their own pockets.

I believe it's the responsibility of Federal agency heads to catch and eradicate wrongdoing in their programs. We created the IG's to see that the agency heads keep those programs efficient and crime free and our citizens get the services they deserve and need.

I also know about the IG's through my work as ranking member of the House Appropriations Committee where I've heard testimony from most of the IG's over the years. The work of guys like Dick Kusserow at HHS, Ray Maria at Labor, William Doyle with the railroads, and Sherman Funk at the State Department is impressive. They and their colleagues throughout Government have amassed a remarkable record.

In fiscal year 1989 the 24 presidentially appointed IG's recovered $727 million, conducted 5,639 successful prosecutions, levied 2,851 administrative sanctions, caused 2,514 personnel actions, made recommendations for over $4.88 billion in recoveries and restitution, and recommended $37 billion in efficient use of Federal funds.

The IG's had smooth sailing until the 1989 Department of Justice, Office of Legal Counsel ruling created havoc and diverted valuable IG resources away from combating the crime to fighting petty turf battles. At the heart of that struggle are three fundamental issues.

What was the intent of Congress when the IG's were created? What is good public policy concerning the power of the IG's to investigate? And lastly, what will happen if something isn't done about this ruling?

I'm going to take a few moments to talk about each issue.

The intent of Congress is clear. The IG's have independent and far reaching powers to investigate criminal fraud and corruption associated with Federal agencies. The OLC ruling would have us believe otherwise. By coining the phrase "regulatory investigations" the ruling significantly changed the IG's authority, unjustly limiting it to investigating Federal employees and Federal funds. Overnight the IG's went from generals to privates. A muzzle was placed on the watchdogs.

The act directed the IG's to prevent and detect fraud in programs and operations of Federal agencies. Meaning anyone receiving Federal benefits such as loans, licenses, permits, or other preferred status, not just Federal funds or employees.

Since the act didn't specify what criminal investigations could be undertaken, it's clear Congress intended for the IG's to go wherever duty called. For example the act didn't distinguish coal operators who don't make royalty payments to the Government and are in cahoots with an Interior Department employee from coal operators who commit the same fraud independently. Only the Department of Justice, not Congress, has split those hairs.

The absence of hairsplitting language in the act sent a clear congressional message to the IG's; go after any fraud associated with Federal programs wherever it is found. Conduct investigations anytime the integrity of an agency is compromised.

The Justice Department also raises the spectre of IG's lusting after program operation responsibility. I have yet to see any of these Federal watchdogs frothing at the mouth, requesting program operating responsibility within the agencies. The argument is a smokescreen, for the real issue: What investigative authority should the IG's have? And Congress' intent is crystal clear.

Since 1978, Congress has reinforced its intent by rewarding the IG's with expanded budgets and additional IG's. If Congress didn't like the results it was getting, the IG ranks wouldn't have swollen from 2 in 1977 to 57 today, with a total budget of $715 million and 9,892 staff. That's an increase of $70 million and 437 staff over the previous year. Since Congress is happy with the IG's, why can't the Justice Department stop worrying and be happy?

Regarding what is good public policy concerning the power of the IG's, we don't have to dig too deep to see the IG's are right for the job. They have undergone the same rigorous training, given all other Federal law enforcement officers. And if the IG's don't do it, who will?

Even though the FBI has the authority and expertise to conduct the investigations, their many other responsibilities keep them from pursuing all the violations associated with Federal agencies. The FBI can't be expected to take on the important work Congress assigned to the IG's over a decade ago.

William Sessions, Director of the FBI, testified before the House Appropriations Committee on March 14, 1990, that the "scope of white collar crime is such that it is impossible for the FBI to investigate all the white collar crime cases that come to our attention."

Sessions' comment wasn't surprising because the FBI's plate is very full. In addition to investigating counterintelligence, kidnapping, and fugitives from justice, the FBI is also fighting the war against drugs, probing the savings and loan industry, and looking into the HUD scandal.

The other possibility, the agency heads, isn't a viable alternative either. Because even though the agency heads have the responsibility to enforce the law, they can't be expected to identify and establish every instance of criminal wrongdoing in agency-regulated programs. And their investigations might generate interagency conflicts.

The ruling also prohibits agency heads, who have criminal investigative powers, from delegating that authority to the IGs' trained criminal investigators.

Not using the IG's to conduct investigations of program regulated by Federal agencies is foolish. The IG's have an excellent record in conducting the type of investigations under question. The IG's have proven themselves to be knowledgeable, competent, and effective. And most importantly they're available.

That brings me to the last issue: What happens if the OLC ruling is left in place?

Its not a pretty picture. Much fraud will remain untouched. Our citizens will lose while the criminals celebrate their good fortune because the OLC ruling stopped the IG's from investigating crimes of vital importance to Americans. Investigations, it's sad to say, the IG's used to conduct.

By attempting to delineate investigations that are appropriate for the IG's to undertake, the OLC ruling stopped a vast array of investigations into federally regulated programs. Those investigations will remain suspended if the OLC ruling isn't countermanded. A quick review of a few agencies reveals the magnitude of what would happen if the bill fails and the OLC ruling remains.

At the Department of State the OLC ruling limited the IG's investigations of fraud in four general areas: First, nonmonetary Federal benefits, such as false statements to obtain Federal licenses, certificates, visa, job, passport, or other benefit; second, nonpayment or underpayment of funds to the Government such as attempts to defraud an agency out of money owed on a contract or lease; third, false certifications, applications or testimony resulting in unwarranted danger to public health or safety; and fourth, impersonation of an agency official or misuse of the agency seal or logo in a way that defrauds a third party.

The Department of State IG has expressed concern about the ruling because U.S. Attorneys can be ordered by DOJ to not prosecute cases brought to them by an IG, if the cases fall outside the parameters of the OLC ruling. This creates a situation where it's dangerous for agents to pursue criminal investigations in areas where the OLC ruling is vague.

At the Department of Interior the IG has identified three types of investigations they've traditionally conducted and now avoid: First, impersonation of agency officials and misuse of the agency seal/logo to defraud a third party who does not receive Federal funds; second, fraud in the procurement of nonmonetary Federal benefits, such as making false application to obtain a Federal license or certificate; and third, fraud in the nonpayment of funds to the Federal Government such as avoiding payments for timber or mineral contracts.

Generally these cases are either too trivial or specialized to be investigated by the FBI. These cases are considered Federal matters by the State and local law enforcement agencies.

At the Department of Health and Human Services the IG's investigation of criminal violations under the Federal Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act have become contentious. Prior to the OLC ruling the IG conducted criminal investigations upon request of the FDA or DOJ. The investigations typically involved: Fraud and misrepresentation by applicants for benefit or approval by the FDA; sale of counterfeit drugs; illegal distribution of anabolic steroids; and drug diversion.

The investigations based on this longstanding relationship ceased when the OLC ruling was issued. The IG was warned by the DOJ Office of Consumer Litigation that continued investigations would place special agents in jeopardy of personal tort liability. The HHS inspector general subsequently suspended all FDA-related investigations.

Many other HHS-related investigations are also now out of bounds, such as: First, Medicare kickbacks involving manufacturers, physicians, or hospitals; second, misuse of symbols such as "Medicare" or "Social Security" in advertisements; third; violations of the Clinical Laboratories Improvement Act authorizing criminal penalties for violations of its statutes; and fourth, counterfeiting, forging, or misusing Social Security cards to obtain benefits other than Federal dollars, for example, credit cards.

At the U.S. Information Agency the OLC ruling has stopped the IG from enforcing the Agency's visa program since organizations issuing the visas have neither Federal employees nor direct Federal funding.

After the OLC ruling the Department of Labor IG suspended over 1,200 criminal investigations because of potential liability of the agents. The cases included: 993 cases of unemployment insurance fraud; 157 cases of wage-and-hour fraud and abuse; 49 cases of Black Lung Program fraud; 21 longshore and harborworker fraud cases; 20 cases of Alien Certification Program fraud; and 15 cases of employee benefit plan fraud and abuse.

At the Department of Housing and Urban Development the IG believes a literal interpretation of the ruling would enjoin his office form investigating equity skimming violations. Skimming is the biggest problem facing HUD's Single-Family Mortgage Insurance Program. Since equity skimmers receive no Federal funds the IG can't investigate the cases. The IG had previously investigated 61 cases and recovered $2 million.

As you can see, if we let the OLC ruling stand, and prohibit the inspectors general from investigating fraud and corruption in regulated programs not receiving agency funds, the ultimate losers will be the American citizens whose health, safety, and economic security will be compromised.

The IG problem is like buying a watchdog to protect your property. You can choose to let the dog instinctively do its job or remove its teeth and lock it in the basement. The OLC ruling has removed the teeth from our watchdogs, and we better respond before the OLC ruling locks the IG's in the basement.

That's why I'm introducing a bill to amend the Inspector General Act of 1978, to clarify the authority of the IG's to conduct audits and investigations in programs regulated by Federal agencies. I want to bring a timely end to the squabbling between the IG's and the Department of Justice. Let's take the muzzle off our watchdogs.

The bill is simple and straightforward. It amends section 4 of the Inspector General Act of 1978 (5 U.S.C. App.), by adding the following language at the end:

(e)(1) In carrying out the duties and responsibilities under this Act, each Inspector General has authority to determine A) the persons subject to, and the nature, scope, and purposes of audits and investigations conducted by the Inspector General relating to programs and operations administered, carried out, financed or conducted by his or her establishment, including programs and operations under regulatory statutes; and B) the authority of the Inspector General to conduct those audits and investigations.

(2) The conduct of an audit or investigation by an Inspector General in accordance with this Act may not be construed as carrying out a program operating responsibility.

This language accomplishes two things. It clarifies that the IG's have the authority to investigate programs regulated by Federal agencies. And it says such investigations do not construe program operation, a contention made by the DOJ.

The bill raises several questions. What safeguards exist against overzealous IG's? What opposition will this bill have? And how much will it cost?

What safeguards exist? That means who watches the watchdogs? OLC ruling implies that since inadequate safeguards exist to protect agencies and third parties from overzealous IG's, the Department of Justice should determine what investigations are undertaken by the IG's. The Department is wrong. Adequate safeguards do exist.

The IG's are selected by the President and are ultimately accountable to him. If the IG's get to far afield the President can reel them in.

Congress and GAO, through normal oversight mechanisms, monitor the IG's. This includes regular IG testimony before, committees of Congress and the semiannual report from the IG's to Congress identifying problems under investigation.

The OLC ruling also implies that special agents of the IG's are akin to rogue cops, setting their own investigative parameters. That's also false. IG's cannot function in a criminal investigative area without close and continuing cooperation with the Department of Justice. At the very least they need DOJ to prosecute the cases.

Congress, working with the General Accounting Office, does appropriately oversee the criminal investigative work of the IG's.

Who opposes the bill? I expect some Federal agencies will oppose this bill. After all, they vehemently opposed the creation of the IG's in the first place and have continued to complain since.

Opposition may also come from the regulated community. In some instances they've benefited from the mild restritution and fines as consequences for violations and oppose the forfeiture of assets and incarceration that might result from aggressive criminal investigations by the IG's.

Since the IG's independently conduct investigations of criminal violations, some folks might oppose this measure because it limits the ability of the criminal element to influence the outcomes of investigations. That sounds like good news to me.

Under this bill the inspector general will be the antidote to permissive policies and lax enforcement of regulations by Federal agencies. Hence, we should expect some people to object to our intent. Fortunately they're the wrong people.

How much will it cost? This measure is revenue neutral. It will not cost taxpayers a single cent, yet it will unleash hundreds of criminal investigators on egregious fraud. It is good government because it promotes efficiency and prudence.

In closing I want to cite one of the most vocal and distinguished spokesmen about government inefficiency and fraud, former Senator William Proxmire. He recently wrote:

To best serve the public interest, any resolution of this jurisdictional clash of investigative agencies should leave the Inspector General with full power to investigate any violation of federal law whether or not federal funds are involved. The Inspector General can provide far and away the best means of preventing fraud and waste in this colossal trillion-dollar government.

I think Senator Proxmire's words summarize this whole issue nicely. My bill gives the inspector general the full power to conduct investigations they deem appropriate. It unmuzzles the watchdogs by clearly stating the intent of Congress.

SENSIBLE ADVERTISING AND FAMILY EDUCATION ACT

HON. JOSEPH P. KENNEDY II

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, we hear a lot of talk about the war against drugs and how many Americans are dying from drug abuse. We spend billions of dollars every year for drug interdiction, treatment, and enforcement.

Yet the greatest drug threat to the society is the abuse of alcohol. Alcohol kills at least three times as many Americans than crack, heroin, and all other drugs combined. In this Nation, 18 million adults and 4.5 million kids are struggling with problems related to alcohol abuse. One-half of the motor vehicle crashes and one-half of the homicides in this country are related to alcohol use.

But despite the known dangers, we continue to allow this drug to be sold by ads that glamorize alcohol use and ads that connect alcohol use with social acceptance and success. Along with selling their products, alcohol advertising also sells values and attitudes about drinking to the public—especially to kids.

Before my two 9-year-old boys reach the legal age to purchase alcohol, they will have watched over 100,000 beer and wine commercials. Beer and wine ads have become the No. 1 source of education for Americans about alcohol. We must think about the kinds of values our kids are picking up as they watch beer ads on MTV with their favorite athlete or a cute, surfing canine extolling the virtues of drinking beer.

I'm not opposed to adults drinking responsibly but I am opposed to the alcohol industry's selling its product as if there were no strings attached with its use. For children, for pregnant women, for persons who have a drinking problem, for persons who take other drugs and medications, for persons who drive or operate machinery—there are serious consequences associated with drinking alcoholic beverages.

And that is why I introduced the Sensible Advertising and Family Education Act [SAFE] on April 4, 1990, to try to provide the public with information so that they can make informed decisions about the use of alcohol. This is done by providing 5 basic warnings on all alcohol advertisements:

First, to prevent the 5,000 babies that are born every year with fetal alcohol syndrome—which is the No. 1 known cause of mental retardation, was have the warning: "Drinking during pregnancy may cause mental retardation and other birth defects. Avoid alcohol during pregnancy."

Second, to prevent the 50,000 deaths due to alcohol-related motor vehicle crashes every year, we have the warning: "Alcohol impairs your ability to drive a car or operate machinery."

Third, to prevent the thousands of overdoses and injuries that are caused because people mix medications with alcohol, we have the warning: "Alcohol may be hazardous if you are using any other drugs such as over-the-counter, prescription, or illicit drugs."

Fourth, to prevent Americans from joining the ranks of 18 million adults and the 4.5 million kids who are addicted to alcohol, we have the simple warning: "Drinking alcohol may be addictive," and

Fifth, to send a clear warning to the 90 percent of the high school kids who have tried or continue to use alcohol, we have the warning: "It's against the law to purchase alcohol for persons under age 21."

Placing warning messages on alcohol advertisements is no panacea for the problems associated with alcohol abuse, but it is a first step in educating Americans about the risks. If we can get this message out to the people who are at risks for problems—especially to kids—maybe we can prevent them from becoming a statistic in this terrible national tragedy. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation which will offer some balance to the thousands of ads which glamorize drinking and associated alcohol use with risky activities. The legislation follows this statement:

H.R. 4493

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress makes the following findings:

(1) Alcohol is by far the most used and abused drug among young people in the United States today. Its purchase by those under the age of 21 is illegal in all 50 of the United States and the District of Columbia.

(2) By the time they reach senior year, 90 percent of high school students report using alcohol at least once in the preceding year. The 1989 National Institute on Drug Abuse/University of Michigan survey of high school seniors found that 33 percent of those surveyed reported that they had consumed five or more drinks at one time in the two weeks preceding the survey.

(3) Alcohol use during pregnancy is the leading known cause of mental retardation.

(4) The average age at which young people begin drinking is 12. By the age of 13, approximately 30 percent of boys and 22 percent of girls classify themselves as "drinkers". Studies demonstrate that the use of alcohol before the age of 15 appears to be one of the predictors of later heavy alcohol and other drug use.

(5) Young people are not well informed about the hazards of alcohol use. Only 43 percent of high school seniors believe there is a great risk of harm from risky drinking activities such as binge drinking once or twice each weekend.

(6) According to the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, an estimated 18,000,000 Americans 18 years and older currently experience problems as a result of alcohol use. It is estimated that 4,500,000 young people are dependent on alcohol or are problem drinkers.

(7) Nearly one-half of all deaths from motor vehicle crashes are alcohol related.

(8) It is estimated that 25 percent of all hospitalized persons have alcohol-related problems.

(9) Alcohol advertising, especially in the broadcast media, represents the single greatest source of alcohol education for Americans. Children see as many as 100,000 television commercials for beer alone before they are old enough to buy alcoholic beverages.

(10) A major 1981 federally funded study found a significant relationship between youth exposure to alcoholic beverage advertising and drinking behaviors and attitudes which can lead to certain forms of problem drinking. Over 80 percent of 2,000 adults surveyed in 1988 for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms by the Opinion Research Corporation believe that alcohol advertising influences underage youth to drink alcoholic beverages. The survey also found that the general public feels that the Nation's young people constitute the group that is most at risk from drinking alcoholic beverages.

(11) The alcoholic beverage industry spends approximately $2,000,000,000 each year on advertising and promotions in the United States.

(12) The 1988 Surgeon General's Workshop on Drunk Driving has recommended that the level of alcoholic beverage advertising be matched with an equal number of pro-health and pro-safety messages and also recommended the inclusion of health warning messages in all alcohol advertising.

(13) Two-thirds of those surveyed in a 1989 Wall Street Journal poll favor requiring warnings about the dangers of drinking on both alcoholic beverage containers and in alcohol advertisements.

CONGRATULATIONS TO CRANSTON HIGH SCHOOL WEST

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the students, faculty, and administration of the Cranston High School West for being named recipients of the Presidential Award for Drug Free Schools. Drugs and drug-related crime are pervasive problems which threaten to cripple our country. I am very glad to see that we are making a difference in Rhode Island.

Out of the 800 schools nominated, Cranston West was one of only 53 schools to win this award. For 2 days last month, representatives of the National Drug-Free Schools Recognition Program visited Cranston West to learn more about the program. They saw firsthand how students, teachers, administrators and parents were pulling together to stop the use of drugs and alcohol among students. The staff learned about Falcons Against Drunk Driving Programs and the peer education program at Cranston West.

Since coming to Congress 10 years ago, I have emphasized a policy of "prevention"—stop a problem before it starts. Cranston West and its principal, Edward Rondeau are proof that the best way to stop drug abuse is to never let it happen. School programs are the local cornerstone in the war against drugs. The drug crisis is a national problem with local solutions.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see that my friends in Cranston have been singled out for this honor. I very proud of our students, teachers, and administrators at Cranston West for their commitment to a drug free environment.

ADDRESS OF THE HONORABLE JACK KEMP AT THE ANNUAL DAYS OF REMEMBRANCE COMMEMORATION OF THE HOLOCAUST

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the great Rotunda of this historic building many of us here attended the annual National Civic Commemoration of the Days of Remembrance. Organized by the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council, this sober ceremony paid tribute to the memory of the 6 million victims of the Nazi Holocaust. The commemorative address for this most solemn occasion was given by our former colleague and the current Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, Jack Kemp.

I have known Jack Kemp and worked closely with him on many issues since I first came to the Congress nearly 10 years ago. We share a deep commitment to human rights and have fought to assure the observance of these fundamental rights around the globe.

Mr. Speaker, Jack Kemp's address yesterday was a particularly profound, heartfelt, and moving statement. I insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I urge my colleagues to give it serious and sober reflection.

The speech follows:

REMARKS BY SECRETARY JACK KEMP

This annual observance of the "days of remembrance" of the Nazi Holocaust and the historically unprecedented, and unparalled destruction of a thousand-year-old civilization, that of European Jewry, serves many purposes. It revives our memories. It honors the victims. It informs the young and it is vital to our understanding, not only of Jewish history, but to Jewish survival as well.

A few years ago at a small Passover Seder with Elie and Marian Wiesel and family friends of ours in Miami, Florida, my wife and I learned what Jewish children have been learning for centuries about slavery and suffering, about struggle, and the exodus, out of the hands of Pharaoh's Egypt.

President Bush said on the eve of this years Passover celebration, that it has special significance because he said, "A great march of freedom is underway for Soviet Jewry, and this year many thousands will celebrate the Seder with their families in Israel. For these people, and for their brethren waiting to emigrate, "next year in Jerusalem" is becoming a promise fulfilled."

The Passover Haggadah specifically instructs Jews to instruct their children about the redemption from Egypt. Memory and remembrance means a fidelity to the truth of history and at this Holocaust Memorial we recommit ourselves—Jew and Christian alike—to the integrity of memory and to the truth of history. Thus this day, as Elie Wiesel pointed out recently, can be both sad and hopeful. And it puts us all in a correct frame of mind for contemplating the awful insights, the warnings and lessons that emerge from this particular moment in history that we recall and remember this day.

Why is there a holocaust memorial in Washington? There were no concentration camps here; but, I believe no location for the U.S. Holocaust Musem could be more appropriate than within the site of our memorials to Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, and Abraham Lincoln.

What an exciting moment in history it is to know that these founders of our precious democratic institutions are being quoted in every language and in every corner of the world. President Bush called it the Revolution of 1989; perhaps it's but the Revolution of 1776, but not yet completed.

This memorial and this day of remembrance teaches equally important lessons, some of which are unpleasant but others so necessary to keeping our pledge, "Never Again!" This day whets our appetite for the true brotherhood of man. We yearn as did the Prophet Isaiah for the days in which, "They shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruninghooks."

To think about and remember the Holocaust makes us sick of violence and war, but makes clear that good men and women, when threatened by aggressors and tyrants, may at times have no alternative to defending themselves than by force of arms.

As Elie Weisel reminded us at the first Holocaust Memorial, "indifference to evil is evil." Would that it were always possible to compromise and split our differences with enemies and adversaries—but we are reminded that Neville Chamberlain and Eduard Daladier came to learn at Munich in September of 1938 that not every enemy can be appeased. Not every conflict can just be negotiated away.

The Holocaust presents Jews with particularly painful and unpleasant lessons. It has, in particular, taught them that there were more people around the world willing to eulogize them than were there to raise a hand to save them when they were attacked by Nazis. It has taught Jews that there are more people willing to apologize to them for the past than are willing to stand by them when they are attacked by anti-Semites, vilified at the UN, and blasphemed with a resolution equating Zionism with the evil of racism. The victims cry out for that resolution to be repealed now!

Holocaust commemorations always culminate in the exhortation, "never again!" But it is vital that we remind ourselves that this is not just a plea. It is not just a declaration somehow aimed at would-be perpetrators urging them not to repeat the crime; rather it is our solemn and sacred pledge, our profession of personal resolve to prevent a new Holocaust. But as important as it is to take this pledge, I believe it is a profound mistake to see that pledge as the only meaning of the Holocaust.

In fact, to see it that way is in my view a great disservice to the memories of those who died and to the lives of those who survived. The Holocaust was not only an historical event. It was after all a specific event unleashed against a particular people at an absolute moment in time, and in a specific place. Besides the untold suffering of millions, the utter destruction of a thousand year old civilization, that of European Jewry, Naziism destroyed not only a people, but a culture, a language, a way of life, and a millennium of memories.

It is true that Zionism predates the Holocaust, but in the broader historical sense the State of Israel is the successor, the orphaned child, of that great, now-destroyed civilization of European Jewry. Much of the culture, the way of life, as well as many individual survivors of European Jewry have taken new root and new hope in Israel, and while the Holocaust tragically decreed that not only would Europe be Jewry's past, it also decreed that Israel would be Jewry's future.

Thus the best way to honor the memory of that destroyed Jewish past is by cherishing, protecting, and nurturing its future as embodied by the rebirth of Israel.

It is not enough to mourn the parent unless we give succor and support to the orphaned child. Indeed it diminishes the memory of the vanished parent to do anything less.

Criticism of the State of Israel, is not in and of itself an act of anti-Semitism, nor is it necessarily an act of "anti-Zionism." Those who would hector and abuse, those who would play politics with its very survival, those who would criticize it according to standards that no other country in the world is subjected to, are doing more than being unjust to one country. They are betraying the memory of a murdered people whose culture and civilization, whose hopes and dreams, whose sons and daughters have found their home at last in Israel.

It is not too much to say then, that when a Middle East tyrant threatens genocide by poison gas warfare against Israel, and proposes to turn Israel into the "last gas chamber," he is declaring himself prepared to finish the work of the Holocaust.

The lesson of this day, in this sacred place, as this moment in history, is that we must protect and defend what has come to take its place in Jewish and world history, the resurrected Jewish state of Israel.

I believe that helping Israel resist tyrants and tyranny and to resist others who would threaten to compromise and weaken the Jewish state, is, the best way to honor the victims of the Holocaust.

ONE OF A THOUSAND POINTS OF LIGHT

HON. GEORGE W. GEKAS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. GEKAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me in recognizing a very special person from my congressional district.

The recipient of many honors and awards, Herbert "Corky" Goldstein is truly a friend to Pennsylvania. He is a busy attorney in Harrisburg, but that does not prevent him from spending countless hours helping others. He is a spokesman and a fundraiser for Pennsylvania's Special Olympics. In addition, he volunteers for the American Cancer Society, and other organizations that support and assist victims of killer and crippling diseases.

Too many times in America, people who have been blessed with good fortune forget about those who have not been so lucky. Not Corky. He has given freely of himself and has served as a role model to many. During his years of service to others, he has represented the qualities that are best about America—commitment, compassion, understanding, patience, and love of fellowman.

On behalf of my constituents, I thank Corky for his dedication.

TRIBUTE TO STATE REPRESENTATIVE JOSEPH W. SUMMERS

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, I place in the RECORD an article from the Indianapolis Recorder about the Honorable Joseph W. Summers, Indiana State representative from Indianapolis.

Homer wrote, "In a just world there would be no need for valor."

Of course we do not yet live in a just world. Valor, especially the kind that is made up of endurance and willingness to sacrifice, is in relatively short supply. But Representative Summers has plenty of it.

He is a man of courage who has inspired an entire community, not ony with that courage but also with the noble causes he has espoused.

JOE SUMMERS NAACP CITIZEN OF THE YEAR

(By Audrey Gadzekpo)

The Greater Indianapolis Branch of the NAACP will salute State Rep. Joe Summers as the "NAACP Citizen of the Year."

Summers, 60, is one of the oldest active members of the local civil rights group and has been involved in NAACP work since 1948.

"The NAACP is a training ground for participation in trying to improve government and the community," said Summers.

His fondest memories of the NAACP date back to his early years in the local chapter when he organized his first boycott against the Riverside Amusement Part in 1948.

Summers also recalls a 1964 protest against Alabama Governor George Wallace when Wallace visited the city.

Summers has been a state representative of District 51 since 1977 and is also director of two funeral homes in the city.

In addition to serving on the board of the NAACP, Summers also serves on the board of Alpha Home. It is a member of the Fidelity Lodge and a trustee of Bethesda A.M.E. Church.

The salute will be held at 6 p.m. May 6 at Christ Missionary Baptist Church, 1001 Eugene St. Dr. Melvin B. Girton has been appointed to serve as a chairman of the Summers' salute.

FATHER DEMSKE HONORED AS MAN OF THE YEAR

HON. HENRY J. NOWAK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. NOWAK. Mr. Speaker, this weekend in Buffalo, NY, Rev. James M. Demske, S.J., president of Canisius College, will be honored as "Man of the Year" at the annual Boys Town of Italy Ball.

This is another richly deserved honor for this Jesuit educator, who has led Canisius College for nearly a quarter century.

The following biographical sketch of Father Demske gives a brief description of his career and achievements:

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF FATHER JAMES M. DEMSKE

Father Demske has served as president of Canisius College, his alma mater, for nearly 25 years. Dramatic change has taken place at the college during his tenure: New academic programs have strengthened the curriculum and eight buildings have been added to the campus to keep pace with growing student enrollment.

A Buffalo native, Father Demske's education at Canisius was interrupted when he left school to serve overseas in the military during World War II. He returned after the war and completed his degree in 1947, the same year he entered the Society of Jesus. He later earned a Ph.L. from Woodstock College in Maryland, an S.T.L. from the University of Innsbruck in Austria, and a Ph.D. from the University of Freiburg in Breisgau, West Germany. He was ordained to the priesthood in Innsbruck, Austria, in 1957.

After teaching philosophy at St. Peter's College in New Jersey form 1951-54, Father Demske became director of the Jesuit seminarians at Bellarmine College in New York. He returned to his hometown in 1966 as president and rector of Canisius College.

His steady guidance at Canisius has proved critical to the college's growth and vitality, going hand-in-hand with his concern for the future of Western New York. That concern bore valuable fruit in 1987 with the establishment of the Western New York Heritage Program at Canisius, which draws on the expertise of faculty and other experts to help area teachers improve classroom instruction in the geography, history, and cultural heritage of this region.

Father Demske has served on the boards of WNED-TV, the Automobile Club of Western New York, the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, the Association of Jesuit Colleges and Universities, and the Commission on Independent Colleges and Universities of New York State, among other organizations. Well known for his avocation as a trombonist, he performs at various college functions from time to time and is a member of the Buffalo Jazz Association and the American Federation of Musicians.

Among other honors, Father Demske was named Outstanding Citizen of the Year by The Buffalo Evening News and Goodfellow of the Year by the Buffalo Courier-Express in 1971. The Buffalo Area Chamber of Commerce recognized him as Western New Yorker of the Year in 1986 on the occasion of his 20th anniversary as president of Canisius College. He is a Distinguished Alumnus of Canisius and a recipient of the Signum Fidei Award as an exceptional graduate of St. Joseph's Collegiate Institute.

Mr. Speaker, as an alumnus of Canisius, which is located in the 33d Congressional District I am privileged to represent, I have seen first hand the positive impact Father Demske's energetic leadership has had on this institution and the contributions it has made—and continues to make—to improving the quality of life in western New York.

I would like to join in congratulating Father Demske on this latest honor and wish him continued success and good health.

CONGRATULATIONS TO NORTH PROVIDENCE HIGH SCHOOL

HON. CLAUDINE SCHNEIDER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Ms. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the students, faculty, and administration of the North Providence High School for being named recipients of the Presidential Award for Drug Free Schools. Drugs and drug-related crime are pervasive problems which threaten to cripple our country. I am very glad to see that we are making a difference in Rhode Island.

Out of the 800 schools nominated, North Providence is one of only 53 schools to win this award. In February, a group of principals from across the country visited North Providence High School. The team carefully evaluated North Providence's substance abuse prevention program, which focuses on peer education. They saw firsthand how students, teachers, administrators, and parents were pulling together to stop the use of drugs and alcohol among students.

Since coming to Congress 10 years ago, I have emphasized a policy of "prevention"—stop a problem before it starts. North Providence High School and its headmaster, Louis Lanni, Jr., are proof that the best way to stop drug abuse is to never let it happen. School programs are the local cornerstone of the war against drugs. The drug crisis is a national problem with local solutions.

Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see that my friends in North Providence have been singled out for this honor. I am very proud of our students, teachers, and administrators at North Providence High School for their commitment to a drug free environment.

CRIME PREVENTION MONTH

HON. DAVID E. PRICE

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing a joint resolution to designate the month of October, 1990 as "Crime Prevention Month." Representative BILL HUGHES, chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime, and Representative HAMILTON FISH, ranking minority leader on the Judiciary Committee, are also joining me in introducing this resolution today. Senator BIDEN and Senator THURMOND are introducing a similar resolution in the other body. "Crime Prevention Month" is supported by the Crime Prevention Coalition which is made up of 130 organizations including the Boy Scouts of America, the National Sheriffs Association, NAACP, FBI, AARP, and the National Association of Attorneys General. This bill will honor and highlight the efforts of millions of our citizens who, whether in law enforcement or acting as concerned citizens, work together everyday to prevent crime and protect their communities. I also hope it will encourage more people to get involved to ensure that their neighborhoods are secure and their homes protected. Without these efforts, many people will continue to be afraid to go out after dark, women and older people will be afraid to walk alone, and parents will be afraid to let their children play in their local park.

This month will also serve to publicize the efforts of a number of innovative, community-based organizations and programs: Neighborhood Watch; Crime Stoppers; Teens, Crime and the Community; Community Responses to Drug Abuse; and Congregations and Support for Families. The National Citizens' Crime Prevention Campaign, featuring McGruff the Crime Dog and promoted by the U.S. Department of Justice, the National Crime Prevention Council, the Advertising Council, and the Crime Prevention Coalition also has helped to spur diverse local partnerships among law enforcement agencies, citizens, businesses, and government to combat crime. Examples of these programs include developing crime and drug abuse prevention curricula, organizing antidrug rallies and forming task forces to help close crack houses.

This October also is the 10th anniversary of the successful McGruff campaign. Through the McGruff campaign, millions of schoolchildren have learned about the dangers of substance abuse and how to protect themselves against crime; 99 percent of all children, in fact, know of and trust McGruff the Crime Dog. As a result of the McGruff campaign, two children in Albany Village, CA, resisted the coaxing of a couple to get in their car because of warnings from McGruff. In Brookfield, CT, police investigating a child sexual abuse case found that the 5-year-old victim would only tell his story to McGruff.

All of these innovative programs have taught people that they do not need to be helpless victims of crime, but by working with their neighbors and with local law enforcement, they can effectively reduce crime in their neighborhoods. These programs, by bringing people together, have helped increase peoples' pride and shared responsibility in their community.

For my part, I hope the designation of this special month will serve as a catalyst in my community to help teach schoolchildren more about the dangers of drugs; teach senior citizens how to protect themselves from attacks and robberies, and to help Neighborhood Watch groups meet the new challenges posed by the abuse of drugs in their community. For me, this is the most important opportunity presented by this month.

While skilled law enforcement agents are still the key to preventing crime and maintaining public order, crime prevention by individuals, and communities plays a key role. As a recent history of neighborhood safety programs has noted, the idea of "community watchmen is as old as the first settlement of the New World. Until well into the 19th century, volunteer watchmen, not policemen, patrolled their communities to keep order. They did so, by and large, without taking the law into their own hands—without, that is, punishing people or using force. Their presence deterred disorder or alerted the community to disorder that could not be deterred."

I hope other Members will join me in promoting this important tradition in our country and in our communities by cosponsoring this resolution.

FAIR HOUSING MONTH

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the month of April as "Fair Housing Month."

In 1949, President Harry S. Truman signed into law the National Housing Act, which declared that all Americans have a right to decent, affordable housing. In April 1968, in the week following the assassination of Martin Luther King, Jr., the Congress enacted the Fair Housing Act, which prohibited discrimination in housing on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, age, and national origin. Though much progress was made in the ensuing 20 years to provide equal housing opportunities for all Americans, the need still existed for removal of barriers to housing for families and handicapped people. In 1988, Congress passed the Fair Housing Amendments Act, which included these needed protections. Furthermore, the 1988 amendments added greater enforcement authority in dealing with violations of fair housing laws.

In my district, the Riverside County Fair Housing Program and the San Bernardino County Community Housing Resources Board are organizing the first Inland Empire Fair Housing Law Conference. The conference will bring together organizations such as the Inland Mediation Board, area realtor boards, regional realtor associations, the local chapter of the Building Industry Association, the Apartment Rental Owners Association, and public officials, to spread the word about fair housing to everyone involved in the process.

The Fair Housing Program in Riverside County helps to educate those in the housing industry of their obligation to provide housing without discriminating, and to educate renters and homebuyers of their rights to livable housing based on what they can afford.

The Community Housing Resources Board in San Bernardino County, a voluntary organization established by the Department of Housing and Urban Development in 1983, helps monitor the implementation of the Voluntary Affirmative Marketing Agreement established by HUD in cooperation with the homebuilding industry.

These fair housing advocates work with realtors, lenders, and builders to create an affirmative market for buyers; displaying the fair housing logo; using advertising with people of a variety of racial and ethnic backgrounds; training realtors to treat potential buyers equally within their desired price range; helping sellers avoid discriminatory practices such as "steering," "redlining," and improperly denying credit.

I have encouraged Inland Empire city councils and boards of supervisors to formally recognize April as "Fair Housing Month" as well. In so doing, we hope to keep the American dream alive, and accessible to all.

THE URBAN HOMESTEADING AND BULK SALES ACT OF 1990

HON. STEVE BARTLETT

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill entitled "The Urban Homesteading and Bulk Sales Act of 1990." This legislation will allow the transferral to low-income families of 15,000 properties over 3 years. These properties are currently in the inventory of the Resolution Trust Corporation and need to be disposed of in some manner. This bill will speed the disposition of RTC affordable single-family properties by authorizing the Department of Housing and Urban Development to buy 7,500 properties in the RTC inventory in bulk over 3 years at a bulk sales price.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

I have attached a section-by-section of the bill:

Summary: Urban Homesteading and Bulk Sales Act

Section 1. Short Title.

Section 2. Authorizes the Secretary of HUD to acquire, in bulk, affordable single-family properties from the Resolution Trust Corporation for the purpose of transferring the units to local agencies participating in the Urban Homesteading Program. Defines price as no more than 50% of fair market value for individual properties, which takes into account savings from the bulk purchase, from holding costs, and from avoided fees and taxes. Allows HUD to dispose of the property in the best available manner if it cannot move the property in a timely manner via the Urban Homesteading Program. Allows Local Urban Homesteading Agencies to finance the cost of such properties above the $25,000 limit. Stipulates that such properties must be transferred to low-income households.

Section 3. Allows Local Urban Homesteading Agencies to take advantage of dispersed RTC properties by waiving the requirement for a neighborhood improvement strategy where the Agency has 10 or fewer RTC properties in a single census tract.

Section 4. Authorizes $135 million over three years for bulk RTC properties and an additional $135 million over three years for FHA and other properties. Authorizes holding costs reimbursing the FHA for holding RTC properties.

Section 5. Amends the Federal Home Loan Bank Act to allow for the bulk sales of RTC property to HUD at a price that is 50% of fair market value for individual properties. Waives certain rules of this Act concerning affordable housing, which will speed the sale of bulk affordable units to HUD.

This legislation will allow the transferral to low-income families of 15,000 properties over 3 years. It will speed the disposition of RTC affordable single-family properties by authorizing HUD to buy 7,500 RTC properties in bulk over 3 years at a bulk sales price.

REMARKS OF HON. JACK KEMP ON REMEMBERING THE HOLOCAUST

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday many of us in this body had the opportunity to share in the moving and poignant ceremony in the rotunda, the National Civic Commemoration of the Days of Remembrance.

When our young people, read of the Nazi Holocaust, they often come away with the impression that these barbaric acts took place hundreds of years ago, before the dawn of civilization.

It is important that we recall that this inhumanity ended with the defeat of the Nazis only 45 years ago—less than a lifetime.

I was especially moved by the participation of six holocaust survivors—Mrs. Vladka Meed; Mr. Daick Feith; Mrs. Rosalie Chris Lerman; Mr. Sam Halpern; Mr. William Ungar, and Mr. Sam Boymel.

These survivors are living testimony that brutal inhumanity can take place in modern times.

Those of us who participated in the commemoration of the House of Representatives were moved by many of the remarks delivered at the ceremony. One of the most memorable of these remarks was the speech by our Nation's Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, our distinguished former colleague, Jack Kemp.

For the benefit of those who could not attend the ceremony, I would like to share Secretary Kemp's remarks with our colleagues by inserting them at this point in the RECORD:

REMARKS BY SECRETARY JACK KEMP

This annual observance of the "days of remembrance" of the Nazi Holocaust and the historically unprecedented, and unparalled destruction of a thousand-year-old civilization, that of European Jewry, serves many purposes. It revives our memories. It honors the victims. It informs the young and it is vital to our understanding, not only of Jewish history, but to Jewish survival as well.

A few years ago at a small Passover Seder with Elie and Marian Wiesel and family friends of ours in Miami, Florida, my wife and I learned what Jewish children have been learning for centuries about slavery and suffering, about struggle, and the exodus, out of the hands of Pharaoh's Egypt.

President Bush said on the eve of this year's Passover celebration, that it has special significance because he said, A great march of freedom is underway for Soviet Jewry, and this year many thousands will celebrate the Seder with their families in Israel. For these people, and for their brethren waiting to emigrate, 'next year in Jerusalem' is becoming a promise fulfilled."

The Passover Haggadah specifically instructs Jews to instruct their children about the redemption from Egypt. Memory and remembrance means a fidelity to the truth of history and at this Holocaust Memorial we recommit ourselves—Jew and Christian alike—to the integrity of memory and to the truth of history. Thus this day, as Elie Wiesel pointed out recently, can be both sad and hopeful. And it puts us all in a correct frame of mind for contemplating the awful insights, the warnings and lessons that emerge from this particular moment in history that we recall and remember this day.

Why is there a holocaust memorial in Washington? There were no concentration camps here; but, I believe no location for the U.S. Holocaust Museum could be more appropriate than within the site of our memorials to Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, and Abraham Lincoln.

What an exciting moment in history it is to know that these founders of our precious democratic institutions are being quoted in every language and in every corner of the world. President Bush called it the Revolution of 1989; perhaps it's but the Revolution of 1776, but not yet completed.

This memorial and this day of remembrance teaches equally important lessons, some of which are unpleasant but others so necessary to keeping our pledge, "Never Again!" This day whets our appetite for the true brotherhood of man. We yearn as did the Prophet Isaiah for the days in which, "They shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruninghooks."

To think about and remember the Holocaust makes us sick of violence and war, but makes clear that good men and women, when treatened by aggressors and tyrants, may at times have no alternative to defending themselves than by force of arms.

As Elie Weisel reminded us at the first Holocaust Memorial, "indifference to evil is evil." Would that it were always possible to compromise and split our differences with enemies and adversaries—but we are reminded that Neville Chamberlain and Eduard Daladier came to learn at Munich in September of 1938 that not every enemy can be appeased. Not every conflict can just be negotiated away.

The Holocaust presents Jews with particularly painful and unpleasant lessons. It has, in particular, taught them that there were more people around the world willing to eulogize them than were there to raise a hand to save them when they were attacked by Nazis. It has taught Jews that there are more people willing to apologize to them for the past then are willing to stand by them when they are attacked by anti-Semites, vilified at the UN, and blasphemed with a resolution equating Zionism with the evil of racism. The victims cry out for the resolution to be repealed now!

Holocaust commemorations always culminate in the exhortation, "Never Again!" But it is vital that we remind ourselves that this is not just a plea. It is not just a declaration somehow aimed at would-be perpetrators urging them not to repeat the crime; rather it is our solemn and sacred pledge, our profession of personal resolve to prevent a new Holocaust. But as important as it is to take this pledge, I believe it is a profound mistake to see that pledge as the only meaning of the Holocaust.

In fact, to see it that way is in my view a great disservice to the memories of those who died and to the lives of those who survived. The Holocaust was not only an historical event. It was after all a specific event unleashed against a particular people at an absolute moment in time, and in a specific place. Besides the untold suffering of millions, the utter destruction of a thousand year old civilization, that of European Jewry, Naziism destroyed not only a people, but a culture, a language, a way of life, and a millennium of memories.

It is true that Zionism predates the Holocaust, but in the broader historical sense the State of Israel is the successor, the orphaned child, of that great, now-destroyed civilization of European Jewry. Much of the culture, the way of life, as well as many individual survivors of European Jewry have taken new root and new hope in Israel, and while the Holocaust tragically decreed that not only would Europe be Jewry's past, it also decreed that Israel would be Jewry's future.

Thus the best way to honor the memory of that destroyed Jewish past is by cherishing, protecting, and nurturing its future as embodied by the rebirth of Israel.

It is not enough to mourn the parent unless we give succor and support to the orphaned child. Indeed it diminishes the memory of the vanished parent to do anything less.

Criticism of the State of Israel, is not in and of itself an act of anti-Semitism, nor is it necessarily an act of "anti-Zionism." Those who would hector and abuse, those who would play politics with its very survival, those who would criticize it according to standards that no other country in the world is subjected to, are doing more than being unjust to one country. They are betraying the memory of a murdered people whose culture and civilization, whose hopes and dreams, whose sons and daughters have found their home at last in Israel.

It is not too much to say then, that when a Middle East tyrant threatens genocide by poison gas warfare against Israel, and proposes to turn Israel into the "last gas chamber," he is declaring himself prepared to finish the work of the Holocaust.

The lesson of this day, in this sacred place, at this moment in history, is that we must protect and defend what has come to take its place in Jewish and world history the resurrected Jewish state of Israel.

I believe that helping Israel resist tyrants and tyranny and to resist others who would threaten to compromise and weaken the Jewish state, is the best way to honor the victims of the Holocaust.

LETTER CARRIER'S BRAVERY NOTED

HON. DON SUNDQUIST

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, a letter carrier from my district, William Brown of Memphis, TN, was recently presented a Special Achievement Award for this courage and quick action in saving the lives of two teenage boys.

At a time when so much in the news is bad news, I thought my colleagues might be encouraged by this account of one man's bravery and willingness to help others.

I request that the following article, which appeared in the March issue of Postal Record, be reprinted in its entirety.

DARING RESCUE FREES USPS WORKER'S SONS

As he was working his route one day, the car in front of William Brown suddenly burst into flames when it crashed with another car at an intersection. Running to the burning vehicle, Brown found two dazed teenage boys trapped inside. He pulled them out and moved them a safe distance away into a nearby yard.

Returning to the scene of the accident, Brown went to aid the occupant of the other car. When he realized that she was not badly hurt, he returned to the teenagers and instructed bystanders to call for rescue vehicles.

After they arrived, the Memphis, Tennessee Branch 27 member gave his name and address to the authorities and left to complete his route.

Witnesses phoned Brown's supervisor to report his acts of bravery. There was no doubt in their minds that Brown had saved the boys' lives, as emergency vehicles would have arrived too late.

Brown later discovered that the boys whom he had rescued were the twin sons of USPS electronics technician Ronald Plautz, who works at the Memphis GMF.

For his herioc deeds, Brown received recognition from his postmaster in the form of a Special Achievement Award. The Highland Heights station carrier was also honored with a plague from the fire department at its annual fire prevention seminar.

REPUBLICANS TAKE DEMOCRATS TO WIRE

HON. MICHAEL G. OXLEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, this past Tuesday evening the annual showdown on the basketball court was held to benefit Gallaudet University. This was fourth meeting between the Fighting Elephants and the Dunking Donkeys. The game was a spirited affair that was nip and tuck 'til the end. With just under 4 minutes to go the Democrats held a 1-point lead. Down by as many as 14, the Fighting Elephants had been led in their comeback by one of the youngsters on the team, CLIFF STEARNS. It was at that point that the Dunking Donkeys turned to their player-coach, TOM MCMILLEN, for a strategy to hold off the fast-breaking offensive juggernaut of the Elephants. The coach did what came natural and told his team "Get me the ball!" MCMILLEN scored 6 straight points, bringing his total for the game to a season high 35, and the Dunking Donkeys came away with a 73 to 65 victory.

CLIFF STEARNS was named the most valuable player for the Elephants while MARTY RUSSO took honors for the Donkeys. RUSSO hit several key three pointers to help stave off the Elephants. As the captain of the Elephants I can only say two things: One is wait until next year, and two is we better start looking in the NBA for someone to run for the House and play on our team.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to extend a special thanks to the officials who volunteered their time and talents to referee this fast-paced game. The referee was Kathleen Haddow and the umpires were John Haddow and Marvin Dawkins. To them all the players are appreciative for their efforts in a no-win situation.

OLDER WORKERS BENEFIT "PROTECTION" ACT

HON. ROBERT H. MICHEL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, in light of the approval of H.R. 3200 by the Education and Labor Committee, I wanted to share with my colleagues a letter from Mr. Wayne M. Zimmerman, vice president of Caterpillar, Inc. Although his letter was written before the committee's actions, Mr. Zimmerman's warnings are still quite relevant.

Caterpillar, as one of the largest employers in my district, is in a particularly good position to describe the possible effects which would follow enactment of this legislation.

CATERPILLAR INC.,
Peoria, IL, March 22, 1989.

Hon. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. HAWKINS: The House Education and Labor Committee will soon consider H.R. 3200, a bill to amend the Age Discrimination in Employment Act (ADEA) by reversing last summer's Supreme Court decision in PERS v. Betts.

Caterpillar urges you to oppose the bill.

In the Betts decision, the court held that employers are not liable under the ADEA if they're observing terms of a bona fide employee benefit plan, including distinctions based on age. The decision overturned Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) regulations that permitted age-based distinctions only where justified by age-related costs.

Contrary to proponents' claims, H.R. 3200 is more than a return to "pre-Betts." It goes beyond the "cost justification" of benefit differentials based on age. Under H.R. 3200, in order to use the defense of age-related costs, employers would have to show exact costs of a specific benefit for each employee. Because group benefit costs—like those for pensions—are aggregated, the group benefit costs for a specific employee are not identifiable. Thus, the cost justification defense could be held unacceptable in discrimination charges.

Also, H.R. 3200 would reduce the possibility that special early retirement programs and severance packages would be offered to employees because it would disallow consideration of pensions as part of a total separation package. Older employees taking advantage of an early retirement package would have to be offered the same severance amount that younger workers—ineligible for pensions—would receive. To do otherwise would "discriminate" against the older employee.

In addition, if both employees were eligible for a pension and the early retirement incentive, H.R. 3200 would require a larger benefit for the older worker—if both employees were to receive equal value.

Faced with the requirement of offering a fixed amount of "incentives" to a larger group, employers would be less able to afford incentives as an option in reducing employment. Passage of H.R. 3200 could force companies—faced with the need to trim employment—to layoff younger workers rather than offer attractive incentives to older employees who may be anxious to retire.

Employers and unions—through the collective bargaining process—often mutually agree to early retirement incentives. The ability to negotiate such agreements would be hampered under this legislation.

And contrary to what some proponents claim, early retirement programs are popular with employees. At Caterpillar, employees frequently ask if the company might again consider offering retirement incentive packages.

A similarly restrictive bill in the Senate has been made further burdensome. The Senate Labor Committee recently approved an amended Betts bill (S. 1511) that included additional language restricting employers' use of waivers as part of separation package offerings. The measure would require employers to pay fees for attorneys to review individual employee waivers, provide detailed job title and age information on who is being offered the same package, and tell employees what is expected to happen to them if they refuse to accept the offer.

The Senate legislation—as does H.R. 3200—restricts employers' ability to responsibly manage their workforces. It is also likely to limit the scope of benefits offered to older Americans.

We urge you to oppose H.R. 3200—and language restricting the use of waivers, should the House Education and Labor Committee follow the action of its Senate counterpart.

Sincerely,

WAYNE ZIMMERMAN,
Vice President.

CRAIG FIELDS TRANSFER

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, as we debate our changing budget priorities, I urge my colleagues to reflect on the critical importance of the strength of the U.S. high technology industrial base to the long-term health of our Nation and to our ability to fulfill the many pressing needs on our national agenda.

It is in this context that I am deeply dismayed by the forced removal of Dr. Craig Fields from his position as Director of the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency.

Craig Fields has been perhaps the most forward-thinking and respected person in Government on our Nation's high technology future. His outstanding leadership and initiative have made DARPA the key agency for driving technological innovation, and his intelligence and drive have been one of the few rays of hope in this administration for those of us concerned about declining U.S. preeminence in technology.

For his exemplary work, Dr. Fields has now been rewarded with a pink slip. Those who have made this sorry decision could not be more shortsighted about America's real national security requirements.

I am particularly concerned that Dr. Field's transfer is only the most recent salvo in a continuing retreat from support for technology programs. I exhort my colleagues to work to preserve and to strengthen DARPA's unique ability to promote critical technologies. And I urge the Department of Defense to reconsider its mistaken action in removing Craig Fields from his position.

TERRY ROGERS WORKING FOR PUBLIC EMPLOYEES

HON. BRUCE F. VENTO

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Speaker, it has just come to my attention that a good friend, Terry Rogers, the legislative director for the American Federation of Government Employees AFL-CIO, intends to return to our home of Minnesota, continuing to work with and representing Federal employees and retirees in a new capacity. I want to share this news with my colleagues who have worked with Terry Rogers on numerous policy issues before Congress.

Terry Rogers was among the first representatives of working people who welcomed me to Washington, DC, following my initial election to the House of Representatives in 1976. Since that time we have worked together on many issues facing all Americans.

I worked with Terry and other AFGE staff in our successful effort to stop the Reagan attack and retain the minimum Social Security benefit of our Nation's senior citizens. On other important issues affecting Federal workers and retirees, Terry has provided me with valuable background information that I relied upon to fight proposed cuts in pay, retirement and health insurance benefits.

Local AFGE officials, Terry and I met with top VA officials to discuss the need for a new St. Paul Veterans Administration hospital and successfully retain functions at the Twin Cities regional VA offices.

Working with Terry, I have often gained helpful insights into the problems confronting civilian technicians in the Guard and Reserves who serve in the Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Iowa, and Nebraska region.

Many of my colleagues and I will miss Terry Rogers' presence in Washington. His advice and hard work have been helpful to us and to Federal employees and retirees. I am certain that we all wish him the very best.

A TRIBUTE TO LARRY J. GRORUD

HON. LES ASPIN

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to honor Larry J. Grorud who was recently selected as the 37th Fire Chief of the Janesville, WI, Fire Department.

Larry Grorud's outstanding career with the fire department began in 1974 when he became a firefighter. From 1975 through 1984 he served as a firefighter and paramedic. In 1984 Larry was promoted to Deputy Fire Chief of Human Resources and Emergency Medical Services. Then on September 25, 1989, Larry was selected as the new Fire Chief of the Janesville Fire Department.

Larry is also chairman of the Rock County Emergency Medical Services Advisory Council and an active member of the International Association of Fire Chiefs.

Larry was born in Eau Claire, WI, on November 12, 1950. He has lived in Janesville since 1960, and was an honor graduate of Parker High School in 1969. After graduation, Larry served in the U.S. Army in Vietnam where he was awarded the Bronze Star Medal.

Larry and his wife, Donna, have been married for 19 years and have four children—Bradley, 17; Robert, 13; James, 10; and Angela, 5. The Grorud family are members of St. William's Parish.

Larry's educational background is extensive. He received his paramedic training at the University of Wisconsin in 1975, he received an associate degree in fire science from Blackhawk Technical College in 1980. Then in 1988, he became an Executive Fire Officer Program graduate of the National Fire Academy in Emmitsburg, MD.

We are fortunate to have someone as dedicated and experienced as Larry Grorud to head up our fire department. He is a man who is constantly striving to serve the fire department and the community. He is active in a variety of community organizations. He is a fire service instructor for the Wisconsin Board of Vocational, Technical, and Adult Education. He is the treasurer of the Firefighter's Relief Association. Larry is also active in the International Society of Fire Service Instructors and the Society of Executive Fire Officers. And, Larry always finds time to serve as a leader with the Boy Scouts of America, as well as Deputy Grand Knight of the Knights of Columbus.

I am proud to pay tribute to such an important and invaluable member of our community. He has worked hard and accomplished a great deal. Janesville is very fortunate to have Larry Grorud as its new Fire Chief. I wish him continued success.

EARTH DAY

HON. C. CHRISTOPHER COX

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, attached is a statement I made on Earth Day, April 22, in honor of the Earth Day celebrations in Orange County, CA.

EARTH DAY 1990

APRIL 22, 1990

Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Orange County, CA, Earth Day 1990 Coalition Advisory Board, and as a member of the National Advisory of Earth Day 1990, I rise today to applaud the hundreds of volunteers in Orange County, whose tremendous efforts and hard work have turned Earth Day into Earth month. Dozens of programs, educational seminars, fairs and environmental tours, designed to remind us of the daily need to preserve our natural heritage, began in early April, and will run into May. I am truly privileged to be a part of this effort.

Months of planning went into all of the events that were put together by the Orange County Earth Day 1990 Coalition. Earlier this month, I dedicated the Earth Day mall display, which has already been visited by thousands of Orange Countians. There have been educational seminars at UC-Irvine, at Cyprus College, Cal State-Fullerton and Fullerton College. Many have had the opportunity to participate in discovery tours of the beautiful Back Bay and Bolsa Chica wetlands, or in nature walks in the Santa Ana Canyon, or along the Santa Ana River. There are tree planting ceremonies being held in Irvine and Fullerton, and throughout Orange County, as well as environmental fairs, and open houses, in Huntington Beach, Newport Beach, UC-Irvine, and at the Santa Ana Zoo.

And today, April 22, Earth Day, thousands of concerned Orange County citizens are participating in the Earth Day Festival and Walk, the largest public event of all. It shows how many of us are committed—as individuals—to helping protect and enhance our environment.

Across our Nation today, and throughout the world, similar activities are bringing together millions of people to celebrate Earth Day. The message of all of this citizen participation couldn't be more clear: each person's efforts make a vital contribution to protecting and improving our environment. Gilbert Grosvenor, President of the National Geographic Society, correctly noted that "the success of the [Earth Day] celebration will rest on each individual's realization that a small voice, if it's strong and clear, can be more powerful than a large group of people who are silent."

All of the public policy research I've seen shows that when people know the costs and consequences of their actions, they act to conserve our precious environmental heritage. That's why the most effective environmental policies come from a well-educated public. The superb work of the Orange County Earth Day 1990 Coalition has made a very substantial contribution to our educational efforts.

President Bush has said that "the race to protect the environment is not a spectator sport." Our ultimate success or failure in preventing pollution and wisely managing our natural resources will depend on how well we instill an environmental ethic in our society, and especially in our children. That's why Earth Day is so important. But even more, the Earth Day celebrations are good reminders that our fragile environment requires constant vigilance. Every day—not just April 22—should be Earth Day.

A TRIBUTE TO THE 75TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE ANTELOPE VALLEY PRESS

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to your attention today an occasion worthy of recognition by all of our colleagues who recognize the critical importance of our free press and the many contributions of the fourth estate. On Wednesday, May 2, 1990, the Antelope Valley Press will celebrate its 75 years of service to the people of Antelope Valley.

The Antelope Valley Press has evolved into one of California's premier newspapers over its long history. It began as a weekly paper—the Palmdale Post—under the stewardship of its founder, A.J. Hicks. The first edition published on April 2, 1915, served over 3,500 valley residents. Within 15 years, the Palmdale Post switched owners several times and later became the South Antelope Valley Press to reflect a growing readership.

On May 4, 1950, the Antelope Valley Press was established and 3 years later found a new home, the present day site of the Palmdale City Hall. In 1958, the newspaper was bought by Arthur Folz, Maurice Markham, Ralph Markham, and Lamont Odett. Three years later, the Antelope Valley Press became a two-family operation as Odett and Ralph Markham became sole owners.

In 1961, the newspaper received notable recognition by two young politicians—California Gov. Ronald Reagan and U.S. Congressman Barry Goldwater. As the years passed, the newspaper continued to grow while maintaining emphasis on local and community news. In 1981, the Antelope Valley Press began publishing 3 days a week and, a year later, added a Friday edition. Washington, DC and Sacramento bureaus were added in 1986 and 1987 to cover breaking political news of importance to the area. By 1988, with the addition of a Wednesday edition, the newspaper became the daily newspaper of the Antelope Valley.

Today, the Antelope Valley Press serves 60,000 readers and circulation continues to grow reflecting the increasing number of people making their homes in the Palmdale and Lancaster area. The recipient of numerous awards for its advertising and editorial content, the Antelope Valley Press has certainly established itself as one of our States finest newspapers.

Mr. Speaker, while the look and style of the newspaper has changed significantly over the years, the Antelope Valley Press has served as a voice, a mirror, and indeed, a leader for the diverse communities it has served. I hope you will join me today in recognizing the many contributions of the Antelope Valley Press in its historic 75th anniversary year.

TRIBUTE TO FATHER LAWRENCE T. FARES

HON. DAVID E. BONIOR

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. BONIOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to a dedicated individual, Father Lawrence T. Fares. Father Fares is celebrating his 40th year as a priest.

Lawrence T. Fares was born in 1925 in Kobayath, Akkar, North Lebanon. In 1940, he graduated from St. Elias' College, Tripoli, as a student of humanities. Then in 1944 he graduated from St. Joseph's College with a M.A. and B.A. in philosophy, arts and languages. Later he attended the International University of Theology in Rome where he was ordained to the priesthood in 1950.

He immigrated to the United States in 1969. His first assignment in the archdiocese as an associate pastor was to Lady of Good Counsel in Detroit, where he worked for 8 years. Father Fares' assignments since then include: St. Louis, Mount Clemens for 6 months; Assumption Grotto for 6 years; and Our Lady Queen of Hearon for 6 months. Since January 25, 1985, he has pastored St. Thomas the Apostle with Holy Name on Van Dyke. He has also run a mission for those in the community at Holy Redeemer on Junction/Vernor since 1977.

Forty years after Father Fares was ordained, he will become the new pastor of St. Ronald Parish Community in Fraser, MI. It is an honor to have such a dedicated individual as a member of our community.

I commend Father Fares on his inspirational leadership. His is a touchstone in our community and will long be remembered as a true friend.

HAZARDS IN THE GRAIN PROCESSING INDUSTRY

HON. BENJAMIN L. CARDIN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. CARDIN. Mr. Speaker, workers in grain mills, elevators, and processing facilities in the Port of Baltimore and all over the United States face unusual hazards to their health and their lives every day on the job. Of primary concern is the accumulation of grain dust in these facilities which leads to respiratory illnesses such as "farmer's lung" and asthma, and which provides the potential for explosions.

On November 9, 1985, such an explosion occurred at the Central Soya grain elevator in Baltimore in which grainworkers Edwin Lawing and Timothy Cannon were badly burned. Sixty grainworkers from around the country have been killed in similar explosions in the last decade, and many others injured.

The Occupational Safety and Health Administration has recognized that accumulated grain dust, which is 30 times more flammable than coal dust, represents a deadly hazard to workers in the grain processing industry.

On December 31, 1987, the Secretary of Labor published a comprehensive set of health and safety regulations for grain handling facilities which recognized that reducing the level of accumulated grain dust was the most important step in lowering the risk factor for workers. The standards specified that no more than one-eighth-inch of dust should be allowed to accumulate.

Strong and continuous efforts must be made to meet or surpass these standards to prevent tragedies such as that which occurred in Baltimore in 1985 from occurring in the future.

The Food and Allied Service Trades has designated April 28, 1990, "Grain Workers Memorial Day," and I would like to join them in honoring these brave individuals.

A TRIBUTE TO TWO FIRE CHIEFS

HON. PORTER J. GOSS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, late last week a single engine plane crashed into the water off Upper Captiva Island, in Florida, causing the tragic and untimely deaths of two of southwest Florida's most dedicated public servants.

As their families, friends, and neighbors mourn the passing of Upper Captiva Fire Chief Andy Anderson and San Carlos Fire Chief Karl Drews—I want to take a few moments today to remember their work and the difference they made in the communities they served so bravely and selflessly.

Both men will be remembered for their loyal dedication to improving their communities' ability to respond to emergencies and ensure the safety of all residents.

Chief Anderson, an active southwest Florida citizen since 1981, worked tirelessly to train people to protect themselves and their neighbors from harm. He fought to rebuild Upper Captiva Island's fire trucks, resulting in safer equipment and a significant reduction in residents' fire insurance premiums. Chief Anderson was respected for his commitment to public safety and his ability to get things done.

Chief Drews was equally dedicated to continual vigilance for public safety and improving the quality of firefighting in southwest Florida. After settling in our area in 1978, he quickly became a leader in the drive to upgrade his own San Carlos fire district, while helping other communities improve their personnel's training and equipment. He, too, commanded our respect.

Mr. Speaker, I extend my deepest sympathies to the families of both of these men. In their sorrow, I hope they will take some comfort in the gratitude that all of us feel for the contributions that Chief Anderson and Chief Drews made to our communities.

INDIAN HOLLOW SCHOOL HELPS THE NEEDY

HON. ROBERT J. MRAZEK

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. MRAZEK. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the rise of the new voluntarism throughout our country in the latter part of the past decade. It is not uncommon for Americans nowadays to devote part of their busy schedules to help cook meals at soup kitchens or to provide assistance to nursing home residents.

Because of the selfless work of people such as the second grade teachers and students of the Indian Hollow School in Commack, NY, I believe future generations will continue to learn how to help improve the quality of life for many less fortunate Americans.

Since 1973, Indian Hollow School's second grade students have raised over $25,000 for the Suffolk Special Olympics, a splendid event that gives handicapped persons a chance to exercise their athletic prowess. Their teachers have adopted a most unique approach to fundraising: The Second Grade Store.

In preparation to set up the store, students write letters to vendors soliciting merchandise, and then they help price the goods they receive. They arrange for advertising by writing letters to the local media. They make and distribute posters throughout the community. In doing so, they sharpen their math skills and get a taste of what it's like to run a business. The culminating activity of this unit is the actual store, which they will open to the public in the school gym on May 1, 2, and 3.

Mr. Speaker, I heartily commend the second grade students and teachers of Indian Hollow School for the time and dedication they have put in to help make the Suffolk Special Olympics a reality. Fine young citizens like 7-year-old Carrie Caulfield, 8-year-old Billy Whitenack, and their classmates prove that the spirit of voluntarism will continue through our next generation.

HONORING DEAN CHARLES MAHER AND DR. THOMAS J. DONAHOE

HON. RICHARD E. NEAL

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. NEAL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, on April 27, 1990, the Education Club of American International College, my alma mater, will pay special tribute to two outstanding individuals, Dean Charles Maher and Dr. Thomas J. Donahoe. These two educators have dedicated their lives to academic excellence, and it brings me great personal satisfaction to recognize their significant contributions here in the House of Representatives today.

For over 10 years Charlie Maher has served the AIC community with distinction. Beginning in 1979 as the chairman of the finance department, and continuing through his current position as dean and vice president for Academic Affairs, Charlie has earned the admiration of his students and the respect of his peers. Indeed, he is a man of tremendous talent and ability who has left his mark on the entire Greater Springfield community. For in addition to his many responsibilities at AIC, Charlie has generously donated his time to serve others, most notably as the chairman of the board of trustees of the Springfield Municipal Hospital.

Born in Canada, Charlie received his bachelor's degree from St. Mary's University and his M.B.A. from Dalhousie University, both in Halifax. Following a brief hiatus in the private sector where he served as vice-president of a marketing and sales firm, Charlie immigrated to the United States and entered the University of Massachusetts at Amherst where he earned his doctorate in higher education administration in 1979. He is a member of several finance associations, and was awarded an Institute of Canadian Bankers fellowship at Queen's University in Kingston, Ontario.

Mr. Speaker, for 32 years Charlie has been married to his lovely wife Josephine, and they have been blessed with 5 children: Catherine, Elizabeth, Charles, Mary and Peter. In addition to his professional accomplishments, Charlie is known for his commitment to physical fitness and nutrition, and for his love for the game of tennis.

During my tenure as mayor of the city of Springfield, Tom Donahoe served as my superintendent of schools. For 38 years Tom had been associated with the Springfield Public School System and his reputation for excellence was well known. He had served in every possible capacity, from teacher, to principal to superintendent, and I was honored to have him as part of my administration. Characteristically, Tom performed his duties with competence and class.

Mr. Speaker, Tom Donahoe was born in Woburn, MA, and following his graduation from high school, he entered the U.S. Army. At the height of the Second World War, Tom served his country honorably in the European Theatre of Operations from 1943–46. Upon his discharge, he entered Salem State College and received his bachelors degree in Education. He earned his masters from Tufts University and his doctorate from the University of Massachusetts in 1966.

While the name Tom Donahoe is synonymous with education, it is also well known throughout the civic community. Tom is a member of the Board of Directors of the Springfield YMCA, the Symphony Orchestra Association and the Private Industry Council to name but a few. He belongs to many other organizations including the Chamber of Commerce, the Rotary Club and the Springfield Education Fund, each of which are privileged to have his considerable services. Tom is married to the former Edith Kenny, and they continue to live in Springfield.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to join with the entire American International College community in saluting both Charlie Maher and Tom Donahoe for their many contributions to the Greater Springfield educational community. I can think of no finer or more worthy individuals for his most prestigious award, and I ask my colleagues to join with me in saluting them today.

DR. GENEVA TITSWORTH

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, Dr. Geneva Y. Titsworth will retire as associate superintendent of the Wayne County Intermediate School District in Wayne, MI on May 11, 1990. It has been my pleasure to work with "Ginny" Titsworth for more than two decades. She is a close friend, a trusted adviser and one of the Nation's strongest and most effective advocates for educational opportunity and excellence for all Americans.

Dr. Titsworth came to the intermediate school district in September 1987 from the Taylor Public Schools, Taylor, MI, where she served as associate superintendent for instruction. An educator in the Detroit area for the past 36 years, Dr. Titsworth is known locally and nationally for her leadership in job training programs as well as the collaborative school improvement process [C–SIP], which is widely used in school planning and problem-solving.

Dr. Titsworth, who has nearly completed an 8-year term on the Eastern Michigan University Board of Regents, was the first women chairperson elected to this board. A Taylor Schools employee for 20 years, she assumed the roles of teacher, reading specialist, learning consultant, elementary principal, and staff development director before becoming associate superintendent. She has also taught in the Dearborn Heights, Wyandotte, Southgate, and Petersburg Summerfield school districts.

In 1987, Dr. Titsworth was appointed by Governor Blanchard to the Michigan Job Training Coordinating Council, followed by an appointment from the U.S. Secretary of Labor to a national committee to review the performance of the Federal Job Training Partnership Act. She also served under Governor Milliken on a State advisory council on block grants and was appointed in 1985 by the State superintendent of instruction as a leader for the Michigan Goodwill Mission to Japan.

In addition to being a member of the Phi Delta Kappa and Alpha Delta Kappa Honor Societies, she has numerous awards to her credit including the E.M.U. Women's Association Award for Advancement of Women, the Wayne State University Anthony Wayne Award for Leadership, the Geneva Y. Titsworth Scholarship Awards presented by the E.M.U. Women's Commission each year, to name a few.

A Dearborn Heights resident, Dr. Titsworth earned her undergraduate degree at the University of Arkansas followed by a master's and a specialist's degree from Eastern Michigan University and a doctorate in education from Wayne State University. She is married to State Representative Richard Young.

I know that in retirement Ginny will remain active in education and public affairs. I join her many friends and colleagues in wishing her well and in looking forward to continuing to work together.

AMERICANS NEED THE FAMILY AND MEDICAL LEAVE ACT NOW

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, for years I have been speaking on the need for a minimum labor standard on leave in America. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations, I have held hearings at which witness after witness testified that there is a definite need for the Family and Medical Leave Act in America. I have listened to the sad stories of many hard working men and women who have lost their valued jobs during times of great family or medical emergencies because of the fact that they worked for an unsympathetic employer and had no protection under the law.

Recently, a report was published by the Women's Legal Defense Fund that substantiates this claim that I have been making since the Family and Medical Leave Act was first introduced 5 years ago. "Working Families Speak: Case Studies of Americans Who Needed Family and Medical Leave" is a compilation of testimony from 54 people from 32 States and the District of Columbia who lost their jobs because they requested leave to care for a newborn or newly adopted child, a seriously ill family member or their own serious illness.

I would like to share with you an excerpt from the report. I have included the introduction to the report as well as three very interesting case studies which exemplify the need for immediate passage of the Family and Medical Leave Act.

INTRODUCTION

The dramatic increase in the number of women working outside the home in recent decades is well-known. This increase means that most American parents—in single-parent and two-parent households alike—have both job responsibilities and families to nurture. For the great majority, this system is necessary to make ends meet. While not perfect, most of the time it works. But there are certain compelling circumstances in which both parents simply cannot be at work. At these times, for some people, the system breaks down.

What happens when family or health needs require that employees be out of work temporarily? Do they lose their jobs, and the financial security that went with their jobs? Luckily, many do not, because their employers have family and medical leave policies that guarantee them their jobs when they are able to return. The knowledge that they will be able to return to their jobs and their incomes—and the continuations of their health insurance coverage during their leaves from work—helps these employees and their families meet their family needs and weather their medical crisis. Some also have temporary disability insurance that may help pay the bills during their leaves.

Unfortunately, not every employer provides employees with such security during periods of great family and medical leave. Some states impose some requirements in the area, but no federal law establishes job-guaranteed family and medical leave as a minimum labor standard. Thus, in our modern society, so advanced in many ways, people still lose their jobs when they have compelling family or medical needs that keep them out of work for a short while. They lose their jobs when they have had babies or adopted children. They lose their jobs when they have been temporarily unable to work because of serious medical conditions. And they lose their jobs when they have been out of work to care for hospitalized children, parents or other family members. When workers lose their jobs, they also lose the financial security that those incomes mean for them and their families. For two-income families, such losses can cause severe hardship; for single mothers, they can precipitate a descent into poverty and even homelessness.

"Working Families Speak" is a compilation of case histories of 54 people in 32 states and the District of Columbia who lost their jobs in these situations. These 54 individuals represent a cross-section of Americans. They are from all walks of life—social workers, coal miners, managers, secretaries, bankers, sales people, teachers, production-line workers, news announcers, security guards. They personify the thousands of individuals across the country who every year need to be out of work temporarily for compelling family or medical reasons, and who lose their jobs because of that need. They have been forced to make the choice that no one should have to make: their families or their jobs. And their stories are stories that could happen to any of us.

Many of these families' stories are heartbreaking, because heartbreaking medical tragedies happened to them. We don't pretend that a minimum labor standard of job-guaranteed family and medical leave could have avoided those tragedies. But we do suggest—and the case histories bear out—that job-guaranteed family and medical leave could have alleviated some of the pain and stress that these families suffered during their most trying times. Moreover, had such a labor standard been in place, the financially disastrous consequences of job loss for these families in crisis could have been prevented. And, some of the drain on society as a whole—in the form of unemployment compensation, for example—could have been reduced.

There is legislation pending before Congress—the Family and Medical Leave Act—that would provide just such a minimum standard. In Washington, D.C.—"inside the Beltway"—the debate on this legislation has focused on numbers: how much will a family-and-medical leave standard cost employers? how much does not having such a standard cost employees? taxpayers?

There is no doubt that the numbers are important. They show the effects of family and medical leave policies in the aggregate. Indeed, they show that our current patchwork policies of varying state laws and individual employers practices have a very real cost, in dollars and cents, to workers and to society as a whole. A 1989 report, (Institute for Women's Policy Research and Women's Legal Defense Fund, Unnecessary Losses: The Cost to Workers in the States of the Lack of Family and Medical Leave), which focused on working women, demonstrated that those costs are substantial: working women and their families lose over $600 million every year because they don't have job-guaranteed parental leave; and taxpayers pay over $100 million every year in unemployment compensation and other jobs because they don't have job-guaranteed parental leave.

But there's a human face behind these numbers too. These numbers represent losses borne by real people— people who have lost their jobs, their livelihoods, their health care coverage and that of their children, their homes and even their self-esteem—when they have been temporarily unable to work due to a family or medical crisis. This report presents the human dimension behind the numbers: to show what it really means, in people's lives, to lose their jobs after family or medical leave.

As policy-makers across the country attempt ways to help working families balance their work and family responsibilities, they cannot ignore the real suffering that is occasioned by job loss after family or medical crises. The case histories in this book are an eloquent plea for the Family and Medical Leave Act.

IRIS ELLIOT (ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI) CHILD WITH SERIOUS HEALTH CONDITION

Iris Elliot had worked for a large corporation in the St. Louis area for seven years when her son Mark was born with an especially severe case of Hirchsrung's Disease, and intestinal birth defect. Her baby was hospitalized for six months after his birth, and underwent surgery three times during this period.

Ms. Elliot requested three months' leave to care for her son during this time. However, despite her excellent work record, she says that her employer would make no exceptions from its policy of granting only six weeks' leave after a birth. Although she was given the option of an additional 90 days' unpaid leave with no job guarantee, Ms. Elliot could not affort to risk losing her job. As the sole insurance carrier for her family, she could not afford to jeopardize her health benefit and her income in light of Mark's considerable medical expenses.

Ms. Elliot thus returned to work after six weeks, juggling her time and energies among work, caring for her still-hospitalized child, and attending her preschool-aged son. Often she drove the 30 minutes to work, then after work drove 30 minutes to the hospital to spend just over an hour with the baby, and then drove back home to care for her other son. She feels that her working during this time was a tremendous burden on the family and that it detracted from her job performance.

Furthermore, doctors have told her that her son's improved condition is related to the small amount of time she was able to spend with him. "No parent should ever have to be torn between nurturing his or her seriously ill child and reporting to work as I did."

Ms. Elliot testified about these experiences before a joint hearing of the House Subcommittees on Labor-Management Relations and Labor Standards on April 22, 1986.

JIM CHOROVICH (FAIRFAX CITY, VIRGINIA) NEWBORN CHILD

Mr. Chorovich worked for the telephone company for ten years as a cable splicer. When his wife Sandy was expecting their first child, Mr. Chorovich requested two weeks off for his baby's birth. He says that his employer denied the request, requiring that he use vacation days instead. When Mr. Chorovich declined, the company left him only the option of taking leave under their rigid policy.

Although his employer had developed leave policy for new fathers, no father-to-be had ever taken advantage of it. Under this policy, fathers were generally required to take six months off from work, with a loss of seniority. The company retained the discretion to consider an employee's request to return to work after 30 days. Mr. Chorovich was reluctant to request a leave under those terms, but went ahead because he wanted to share in the first few weeks of his baby's life.

However, when he asked to return to the job after 30 days, he says that his request was denied. He explains that he was told that the company had called a hiring freeze. Despite this "hiring freeze", the company had recently hired at least four other cable splicers in the Northern Virginia area. The only other available jobs carried substantially less salary and status than that of cable splicer.

Represented by his union, The Communications Workers of America, Mr. Chorovich immediately filed a grievance. Although the union ultimately succeeded in recovering his job, he was out of work for nine long weeks with no paycheck. Struggling to care for a newborn without any income created a tremendous emotional and financial burden for the Chorovich family. When Ms. Chorovich gave birth to their second child a few years later, Mr. Chorovich reluctantly decided not to request the leave he desired for fear of further hassles with his employer.

SHELIA ROBARGE (BROOK PARK, MINNESOTA) MEDICAL LEAVE

Ms. Robarge, a sales coordinator for an engineering company of about 100 employees, suddenly became very ill at work one day in 1985. After her employer advised her to seek a doctor's attention, she was told that she needed gall bladder surgery. Although her condition was not yet an emergency, her doctor told her that one could quickly develop.

Ms. Robarge and her employer worked together to schedule the date of her surgery. When her doctor informed them that she would need thirty days to recover from the surgery, she reports that the employer approved her leave.

On the morning before her surgery, Ms. Robarge was scheduled for a preoperative examination. She returned to work after the examination. There she explains that her supervisor handed her a termination notice. Ms. Robarge lost her medical coverage along with her job.

After losing both her job and health coverage, Ms. Robarge first thought of canceling her surgery. However, she suffered two serious gall bladder attacks over the weekend and had no choice but to go ahead as planned. She was forced to receive government medical assistance to pay for her medical expenses.

Ms. Robarge remained unemployed for five months, collecting unemployment insurance for four months. She has since found her new employment, but has had to work her way back to her former salary.

If the Family and Medical Leave Act had been law, these individuals would have been relieved of some of the stress they experienced in trying to balance work and family responsibilities during a time of crisis. The Family and Medical Leave Act would provide employees the right to up to 10 weeks of unpaid leave, over a 2-year period, for the birth or adoption of a child or to care for a seriously ill child or parent. It also provides for up to 15 weeks of unpaid medical leave over a 1-year period if the employee is seriously ill or injured and unable to work.

H.R. 770 exempts small businesses. Moreover, it will not put a substantial burden on those employers required to comply. The Family and Medical Leave Act is a modest proposal that will benefit many hard-working Americans who need time off for family or medical emergencies and can't afford to lose their jobs or their health coverage.

The Family and Medical Leave Act is good and necessary public policy and I urge my colleagues to support it.

I would like to commend the Women's Legal Defense Fund for their excellent report, "Working Families Speak: Case Studies of Americans Who Need Family and Medical Leave". It is proof positive that the time has come to enact the Family Medical Leave Act.

REINTRODUCTION OF DOWNEY LIFE INSURANCE BILL

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am reintroducing legislation today which I had previously introduced on April 3, 1990 concerning the taxation of insurance companies. My good friend and colleague JIM MOODY is joining me today on this legislation as an original cosponsor. This bill is in every respect identical to H.R. 4446, the bill I previously introduced on insurance taxation.

DRUG TREATMENT IN PRISONS

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Prison Drug Treatment Act of 1990, a bill to begin a cleanup of our Federal prison system by instituting effective drug treatment of addicted inmates.

This bill says to drug criminals, "Now you will not only get caught—you will also get clean."

The bill authorizes $75 million for effective treatment of Federal, State, and local inmates. Of this, $25 million goes to Federal prisons, $40 million to State prisons, and $10 million for treatment of juvenile offenders.

It is ironic that American prisons and jails are just as full of illegal drugs as the streets where crime happens. Cocaine is so plentiful in jail that 74 percent of inmates in the New York City jails tested positive for cocaine last year. Yet only a quarter of 1 percent of the entire Federal prison budget goes for treatment of addicted inmates—this at a time when drug-related criminals are the fastest growing segment of our prison population.

Administering tough, effective drug treatment to prisoners is the only way that society can make a dent in the problem of drug-related crime. Of criminals serving time for a drug-related offense, 50 percent are arrested again within 3 years. Thousands of others return to drugs but do not get caught.

In my own district of Hudson County, NJ, the county prosecutor, Paul DePascale said.

The Guarini bill is absolutely what we need. Our fight on drugs has been long on law enforcement and education, but short on treatment and rehabilitation. While potential abusers are being ignored, current abusers are falling between our fingers. The voluntary treatment programs provided by the Guarini bill will make incarceration more meaningful and, in the end, reduce the number of repeat offenders.

Similar comments came from Father Norman O'Connor, director of a therapeutic community treatment center in Paterson, NJ, for drug-addicted offenders. He said:

The "hit-or-miss" version of drug treatment which now exists in our prison system has been shown to be woefully inadequately * * * Passage of the Guarini bill for drug treatment of prisoners will provide a true basis for rehabilitation of prisoners who were drug abusers, and return them to their home communities as productive, non-drug-using individuals. Instead of learning "how to better use drugs" while in prison, these people will now learn "how not to use drugs" when they are released.

My bill is only a small step toward cleaning illegal drugs out of our prisons, and after that, out of our streets. I hope I can count on your support. It is good policy. It is fiscally conservative. And it is desperately needed if we are to exert control over the chaos of drugs and crime.

I would like to commend Senators CHAFEE and MOYNIHAN for introducing this bill on the Senate side. I hope that both Chambers will work in concert to make this concept a reality.

Thank you.

IN TRIBUTE TO MICHAEL MURO

HON. ELIOT L. ENGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, we have all met public servants that give of themselves way beyond the responsibilities of their jobs.

One such person was the late Michael Muro who served as city assessor of Yonkers, NY. On April 27, 1990, political and community leaders will join together to establish a foundation and scholarship fund in his memory.

Though Michael Muro was involved in many professional, political, and community associations, he was deeply committed to our young people. He was active in a number of youth development activities including coaching baseball, basketball, and soccer teams. The foundation's scholarships will be provided to the type of students Michael worked with.

Michael Muro's dedication and commitment to one of our most precious resources, our youth, will be carried on through the work of this foundation and scholarship fund. I cannot think of a more fitting tribute to Michael.

TROOP ONE OF BRIDGETON CELEBRATES ITS 75TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, today, I would like to pay tribute to Troop One of Bridgeton, NJ, which this year is celebrating its 75th anniversary as a chartered member of the Boy Scouts of America.

Even though the Boy Scouts of America was incorporated here in the United States in 1910, it was not until 1916 that Congress granted the Boy Scouts a charter.

Troop One was organized in February 1913, 3 years before the Boy Scouts received its charter, by Percy W. Owens. At first, Mr. Owen's troop had only eight members and they met in the basement of the First Presbyterian Church. However, the troop did not stay small for long. From 1917 to 1923, Troop One grew to be one of the largest Boy Scout troops in the country when its ranks swelled to 280 registered Scouts. In its 77 years of outstanding service to the community, Troop One has given thousands of Bridgeton area youth the Scouting experience.

Throughout its history, Troop One has built a tradition of service to the community. Whether in times of national crisis or otherwise, the boys in Troop One have helped the people of their community in a myriad of ways. During World War II, they helped the war effort by selling war bonds. In times of emergency, they helped the Red Cross. Not a month has gone by when they have not assisted the poor, the elderly, or the disadvantaged or participated in activities which promote patriotism.

Scouting instills in our youth character traits that enhance the quality of their lives and equips them to be better citizens. Over the years, we have been very fortunate to have fine leadership at the helm of Troop One. They have taught the Scouts citizenship, leadership, integrity, compassion, and so many other qualities that have enriched their lives and those around them.

The success of Troop One can be readily seen in the community. Many of its members have gone on to distinguished careers in medicine, science, business, education, law, and the military. Others have turned out to be our finest craftsmen and most committed and productive citizens. They, also, have remained loyal to Troop One and are among the most supportive of the Scouting movement.

As well as having a remarkably distinguished record of public service, Troop One has the distinction of having 75 uninterrupted charters; thus, making the Troop the oldest in southern New Jersey and certainly among the oldest in the United States. It is with great pleasure that I join with the greater Bridgeton Community in celebrating the 75th anniversary of Troop One of Bridgeton. It has had a most remarkable and distinguished record of public service.

KANSAS TOOLING AND MACHINING INDUSTRY

HON. JAN MEYERS

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mrs. MEYERS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I am proud to announce that Jose Thomas of Kansas City, MO, an apprentice with A & E Tool & Die Co. of Kansas City, KS, was a regional winner in the National Tooling & Machining Association's [NTMA] 18th Annual Apprentice Contest. A & E Tool & Die Co. sponsored Mr. Thomas in the contest.

This contest drew attention to the importance of the tooling and machinery industry to our Nation's economy. This industry is essentially the means of production for our country's manufacturing sector.

The contest was open to all fourth-year apprentices employed by NTMA member companies. Finalists in the contest were among the very best in the tooling and machining industry. With a shortage of skilled tool and diemakers, Jose Thomas' skills are greatly appreciated in an industry which generates annual sales in excess of $20 billion.

Mr. Thomas competed with 13 other regional winners throughout the United States in the finals competition held in Meadville, PA from April 2 to 4. I welcome Mr. Thomas' specialized skills in the tooling and machining industry, and congratulate him on this fine honor.

LOCAL HEROES, GLOBAL CHANGE: A CAMPAIGN TO INCREASE AWARENESS OF GLOBAL ISSUES

HON. TONY P. HALL

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. HALL of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, increasing awareness of global issues is currently one of the most challenging tasks facing our Nation today. Now more than ever, cooperation is needed in the international community to raise issues relating to the environment, hunger, poverty, and health. In recognition of the efforts of organizations and individuals attempting to promote a better understanding of problems prevalent in our global environment, I would like to call to your attention "Local Heroes, Global Change," a series that will be aired on the Public Broadcasting System [PBS] in May.

The series consists of four 1-hour programs targeted to encourage positive change against poverty and environmental destruction. The programs provide a vivid illustration of committed people, working together toward a common cause. The programs are diverse; ranging from Western ideas about development and grassroots realities in the Third World, to the political barriers to change existing at the local, national, and international levels. The viewer travels to locations such as South Asia, the Andean highlands, the Caribbean, western and southern Africa, the halls of the United States Congress, and the world trade talks at Geneva.

For the past 2 years, representatives of U.S. development, education, farm and service organizations have been in dialog with the producers of "Local Heroes, Global Change," to help ensure that the series will serve as an effective educational resource.

As chairman of the House Select Committee on Hunger, I feel this type of public education is essential to promotng awareness, and encouraging positive change against poverty, hunger, and environmental destruction. The efforts of public television and the South Carolina ETV, the presenting agency, are to be commended as an effective educational resource in this effort.

TRIBUTE TO ROGER McCOMAS

HON. MATTHEW G. MARTINEZ

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1989

Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise with great pride to honor the career of a dedicated public servant and personal friend. After serving eight terms as mayor of the city of Bell Gardens, Roger McComas is celebrating his retirement today.

Roger and his family moved to the city of Bell Gardens in 1948. Roger, his wife Ruth, and their three children all graduated from Bell Gardens High School and have contributed a great deal to the development of their community.

Roger served on the Bell Gardens Parks and Recreation Commission from July 1966 until he was elected to the city council in April 1968. Prior to his term on the city council he held the offices of vice president and president of Bell Gardens Junior Chamber of Commerce.

In addition to his political career, Roger represented the city and acted as a delegate to several organizations, including the County Sanitation Board, the League of California Cities, California Contract Cities Association, Southern California Association of Governments, the City Selection Committee, and Southeast Animal Control Authority.

Through his leadership the city of Bell Gardens has seen many changes and improvements. Major developments in the commercial and industrial areas came to fruition, as well as improved services to the local residents. Thanks to many of Mayor McComas' ideas and foresight the city provided its citizens with its own police force and fire department, and managed to secure its financial base without raising property taxes. The latter, as we on Capitol Hill know only too well, is no easy feat.

Mayor McComas will be missed greatly both by his coworkers and constituents. We wish Roger and his family all the best in his well-earned retirement in Havasu City, AZ.

LSCA TITLE III

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, in today's society libraries are not able to meet all the information needs of their users. Their budgets are not large enough, and even if they were, their buildings could not house enough items to satisfy the needs of every person in the community. In order to deal with this problem, libraries have for many years shared their resources in a system known as interlibrary loan.

The interlibrary loan network in South Carolina is one of the most efficient and state-of-the-art in the country. Through the use of this microcomputer network and communications technology, a resident of a small town or rural area has the same access to library resources around the State as a resident of a large city. Members of the network include not only public libraries, but also schools, colleges, and major research institutions throughout the State. Over 31,000 requests for library materials or information were placed and filled during fiscal year 1989. The vast majority of these requests were filled and sent to the person requesting them by the next day. The existence of the online network and its overwhelming success have presented libraries in South Carolina with new opportunities for service to the citizens of our State, and libraries report that there has been over a 25-percent increase in demand for this service since the inception of the online network in 1986.

LSCA title III continues to be the major funding source for the interlibrary loan network in South Carolina. Title III has also been a primary source of funds for library automation and conversion of card catalogs to machine-readable form. Often title III is also the only source of funding for experimenting with new technologies, such as telefacsimile machines. Continued funding of LSCA title III is vital so that geography will not be a barrier to accessing the materials and information found in libraries throughout the State and throughout the Nation.

SUPPORT FOR GRAIN WORKER'S MEMORIAL DAY

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call your attention today to tragedies occurring throughout the Southern and Midwestern United States which are often overlooked. In the last decade, 60 workers in grainmills, elevators, and processing facilities have been killed and 275 were injured. Many have died in grain dust explosions, a few of which have been in my own district of western Kentucky.

To the surprise of many, workers in grainmills, elevators, and processing facilities daily risk their lives exposing themselves to grain dust explosions, asphyxiation, exposure to pesticides, drowning, and other construction accidents. It is indeed ironic that grain, the symbol of plenty, has caused the needless bloodshed of those working in its processing facilities. Furthermore, the real tragedy is that the numerous casualties could have been prevented.

Various Government agencies have completed studies of the incidences determining that they are preventable. For example, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration has recognized that accumulated grain dust represents an explosive and deadly hazard to workers in the grain-processing industry, but if accumulation of grain dust is limited to certain levels, the regularity of explosions may be reduced.

Now is the time for the Federal Government to step in and end the senseless carnage. The first step toward solution is recognition. Congress has acknowledged the tragic deaths by recognizing April 28 as Grain Worker's Memorial Day. Grain workers across the Nation have set aside this day in remembrance of the deaths and injuries caused by the hazards of their workplaces. The workers will not simply mourn, but they will strive to change job site health and safety laws that will give workers greater rights to act in preventing such tragedies in the future.

TRIBUTE TO COACH GEORGE BOSSI OF LOWELL HIGH SCHOOL

HON. CHESTER G. ATKINS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to pay tribute to Coach George Bossi of Lowell High School on the celebration of his 25th year as a wrestling head coach.

George Bossi has distinguished himself as a coach, educator, and leader. Teams coached by George have had unequaled success: 5-time Merrimack Valley Conference champions, 11-time Division 1 North champions, 10-time State champions, and 4-time New England champions. His coaching has resulted in 44 individual State champions and 19 New England champions. His career record of 418 wins, 7 ties, and 65 losses establishes him as a true legendary figure in high school athletics. On two occasions Coach Bossi has been recognized for hs outstanding abilities by the National Coaches Association.

As an educator, George has affected the lives of hundreds of individuals and brought Lowell High School to national prominence. Many students have, by his influence, been inspired to continue their educations—to try even harder and to develop fully their physical and academic talents. Dozens of Coach Bossi's former wrestlers point to the influence of his direction and discipline in the lives of athletes and students as life changing. Lowell High School, its teams, and students, have all learned self-esteem, pride, and excellence from the example of George Bossi.

It is for this success in educating athletes and students that Coach Bossi is to be congratulated on his 25 years of outstanding service. His is illustrative of the excellence that lies within all of us and that only great educators are able to tap. Thanks, Coach.

ARE WE "PULLING A REVERSE LITHUANIA" IN PUERTO RICO?

HON. JAMIE B. FUSTER

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. FUSTER. Mr. Speaker, in recent days my colleagues have heard me raise the issue several times about the political status of Puerto Rico. More specifically, they have heard me exhort the Congress to take a closer look at what is going on in Puerto Rico as regards the rising expectations among the people there about pending legislation which would authorize a political status plebiscite in the summer of 1991 among the choices of statehood, independence or an enhancement of the existing commonwealth status. As I'm sure you know, Mr. Speaker, I favor the latter option.

As I have noted before, some of these high expectations in Puerto Rico have been created by Washington itself. For example, President Bush went before a joint session of Congress early last year, and during the course of his speech told of his favoring statehood in the context of self-determination for Puerto Rico.

Then came the hearings on S. 712, the Puerto Rico Status Referendum Act, before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee. Those all-day hearings were televised live, and in their entirety, back to Puerto Rico. And the House Subcommittee on Insular and International Affairs also has held recent hearings here and in Puerto Rico. All of this has had the cumulative effect of changing Puerto Rico's political reality, and the Congress should take a closer look at what is going on, as the national press has been doing.

One of the central issues of this ongoing debate is whether Puerto Rico is ready to become a State. Georgie Anne Geyer, a nationally syndicated columnist, confronts this issue in a most perceptive article which appeared April 12 in the Washington Times. I commend the article, reprinted below, to the attention of my colleagues:

[From the Washington Times, Apr. 12, 1990]

PULLING A REVERSE LITHUANIA?

(By Georgie Anne Geyer)

The whole world knows that Moscow has its "Lithuania," a nettlesome political problem of independence that could easily sink into tragedy. Long-suffering Lithuania wants to secede from the Soviet Union, thus threatening the Soviet Union with political disintegration and economic breakdown.

But the American union has sneaking up on it, unrecognized, its own reverse economic Lithuania, in the unlikely guise of the prosperous and treasured commonwealth of Puerto Rico. In contrast to the problem in the Soviet Union, sentiment is growing on the island for statehood—to join the United States fully. But this would surely bring only economic breakdown to Puerto Rico and undreamed-of economic and political problems to Washington.

Ah, but wait, the statehooders consistently say, there is no proof that statehood would impoverish the island. Relentlessly, they push the line that statehood would bring a Santa Clause bonanza in federal moneys and subsidies to the island.

Now that argument can be thoroughly dispelled. We finally have two stark and revealing new studies that prove beyond the shadow of a doubt that statehood would be a disaster for the island and for the entire United States.

The first study comes from the Congressional Budget Office. Under statehood, the office says, the island's GNP would drop by 10 percent to 15 percent while unemployment would double. Between 30 percent and 50 percent of Puerto Rico's famous "Section 936 plants" would leave the island by the year 2000 because their incentive to stay would be eliminated. According to American law, they currently do not pay taxes, thus providing the island with a huge economic bonus. Critical exports would be reduced by between 33 percent and 43 percent by the year 2000, and the whittling away of the critical industrial base under statehood would lead to a loss of between 70,000 and 185,000 jobs.

The second study, as unknown as the first, was recently released by the firm of Peat Marwick & Co., which was engaged by Puerto Rican Gov. Rafael Hernandez Colon, an impassioned commonwealth supporter. This firm came to almost exactly the same conclusions as the CBO. It states that between 31 percent and 67 percent of the Section 936 plants would leave Puerto Rico and that any formation of new ones would be either dramatically curtailed or eliminated entirely, with the loss of between 80,000 and 145,000 jobs and unemployment nearly doubling to 30 percent.

The cost to the mainland for the end of the commonwealth relationship (Puerto Ricans are American citizens but do not vote for president) would be so high as to be mindboggling. The CBO estimates that it would cost the mainland $17.7 billion (yes, billion!) between the time of the vote among Puerto Ricans for status (probably in the next year or so) and the year 2000. The second study predicts that it would cost between $22 billion and $25 billion during that same period.

Tellingly, the pro-statehood party, the New Progressive Party, which has been avidly stoking the emotional flames for statehood, has had the same money available from Congress ($500,000) as Mr. Hernandez and his party to do a study on the results of statehood. Although the study apparently is in progress, the party has not so far made known any results.

The simple fact is that the statehood issue has now been posed with stark clarity: Under statehood, Puerto Rico would lose the relative but real independence it has under commonwealth status for improverishment economically and for who-knows-what resulting political upheaval. It would go from its present envied position as the economic and technological wunderkind of the Caribbean—for instance, that small island buys more from the mainland than Brazil, Colombia, Argentina and Chile combined, or all of Africa—back to its origins in the 1940s as the "poorhouse of the Caribbean."

But back to Lithuania. The comparison may at first seem to be stretching things a bit; unfortunately, it is not. For if this age is anything, it is an age not of "total independence" (half the developing world tried that after World War II, and it failed everywhere) but as a respectful and decent rearranging of mutual dependencies on everybody's part. It is an age of special relationships constantly being hammered out, such as trying to give Lithuania as much independence as possible without threatening Moscow with a domino effect should be to try to ensure the remarkable prosperity of a beautiful island such as Puerto Rico, while giving it, too, as much independence of action as possible.

The irony is that, unlike Lithuania, Puerto Rico statehooders are not rejecting the center, Washington, but want to join it more fully. Still, both situations cry out not for absolute solutions based on emotional nationalism but for solutions in which the crucial power imbalances between big and little are evened out by special relationships.

It would be a tragedy if Puerto Rico, with all its successes, were now to go back to the economic morass from which the rest of the world is so doggedly struggling to rise.

TRIBUTE TO REV. KENNETH J. YOUNG

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I call the attention of the House of Representatives to the Reverend Kenneth J. Young from my home State of New Jersey. It is only fitting to pay tribute to Reverend Young for the incredible amount of time and devotion he has given to the disabled community of New Jersey.

Nine years ago Reverend Young and a small group of associates founded the Bethesda Christian Center, the first known church for the handicapped. By combining training, counseling, and special activities with worship, he has provided tremendous support to the disabled members of his parish. In honoring the reverend and his accomplishments today I sincerely hope that his example will serve to motivate others across the Nation to help those that are physically disabled.

On the occasion of the ninth anniversary of the Bethesda Christian Center, I extend my warmest congratulations and support to Reverend Young and to the Bethesda Christian community, and I wish them only the best in all their future challenges.

FAMILY AND MEDICAL LEAVE ACT

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, when we become parents of a newborn or an adopted child, become temporarily ill, or must care for an ill family member, we should not be forced to choose between our jobs or such urgent needs. It is harsh, unwise, and economically unsound to force such a decision. The Family and Medical Leave Act of 1989 would ensure that employees of large companies would not be forced to make such a decision, by guaranteeing their jobs after a leave.

This guarantee is most needed by lower-income workers, especially unmarried mothers, part-time employees, and younger workers. However, all people need the protection of the Family and Medical Leave Act; most American families have 2 income earners, and an estimated 8.7 million women are raising 16 million children without the help of a husband. Furthermore, because a high percentage of minority households are headed by women, the leave is especially needed by minority families.

The law would not hurt businesses, but strengthen them. Small businesses would be exempt, and the cost of the unpaid leave is minimal, according to the GAO. Companies such as IBM and US West have proven that it works. In fact, the GAO has found that the legislation would save rehiring and retraining costs, create higher morale and increase productivity.

Thus, I urge my colleagues to strongly support this historic legislation.

OPENING STATEMENT FOR THE INTRODUCTION OF THE CENTRAL EUROPEAN OUTREACH ACT OF 1990

HON. JOHN J. LaFALCE
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, April 25, 1990

Mr. LAFALCE. Mr. Speaker, central Europe's democratic revolution has set in motion a series of changes which have already had a major impact on United States policy toward the region. And nowhere have these changes been more pronounced than in the economic arena: within the space of a year these countries have in the most unambiguous terms rejected the centralized, planned bureaucracies imposed on them by the Soviet Union four decades ago, in favor of more flexible, market-oriented economic systems. After 40 years of enforced isolation, these sudden, dramatic shifts in economic thinking and practice have set the stage for central Europe's entry into the contemporary global trade and payments system.

As head of a 13-Member congressional delegation to the region last January, I had the opportunity to observe these economic changes at first hand. In discussions with political leaders and economic experts from Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Hungary, Poland, and Yugoslavia, my delegation probed the intentions and aspirations of its recently liberated peoples. We heard and experienced a good deal. But one fundamental truth emerged: they want the United States to play a major part in the economic transformation of central Europe. Mr. Speaker, this is a responsibility and an opportunity, which we must grasp.

To pursue this goal, Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the central European Outreach Act of 1990. This bill is designed to strengthen America's presence in central Europe's rapidly changing marketplace and to complement the legislation reported by the House Foreign Affairs Committee. It endeavors to accomplish these goals in four specific ways:

First, through a major expansion of the staff of the Commerce Department's Office of Eastern Europe and Soviet Affairs and the assignment of additional foreign service officers to United States Embassies in central Europe;

Second, by substantially increasing the presence of our Peace Corps volunteers in central Europe;

Third, by strengthening our export finance and political risk insurance programs through the Export-Import Bank [Exim] and the Overseas Private Investment Corporation [OPIC], respectively;

(4) Finally, through a major overhaul of America's export control program.

STRENGTHENING OUR MANPOWER BASE

Aware of the growing opportunities available in central Europe, American exporters are finding that on yet another major front, they are badly disadvantaged in comparison with their Japanese and Western European competitors: personnel. In a word, the U.S. Government simply does not have nearly enough qualified people on the ground in Washington to respond in a timely, accurate fashion to the most routine requests being made in growing volume by our private sector, from up to date briefing papers on the status of Czechoslovak reform efforts, to the phone number of an important administrator in Hungary.

Nowhere is this problem more acute than in the Department of Commerce's Office of Eastern Europe and Soviet Affairs. Formed during the early 1970's, this Office once enjoyed a large number of first-class country analysts, whose job was to matchup United States businesses with counterparts in central Europe and the U.S.S.R. With the deterioration of United States-Soviet relations in the late 1970's, however, its budget was slashed to the bone. As result, at the very moment when prospects for United States business in central Europe have never been more promising, this Office boasts and grand total of 12, that's correct, 12 full-time professionals. We need to do something about this situation. Right now.

Our budgetary difficulties are real; starving our Government of needed personnel in the name of short-term fiscal expediency is hardly the answer to our long-term budgetary problems, however. On the contrary. If the United States expects to compete on a level playing field with its Japanese and European allies, it must be prepared to fully fund those parts of the United States Government upon which the private sector relies, beginning with the Commerce Department's Office of Eastern Europe and Soviet Affairs. In light of the growing demands being placed upon it, I am calling for a tripling of its professional staff, from 12 to 36. Such an investment will, I am sure, pay for itself a thousandfold.

Similarly, the United States needs to strengthen its commercial-diplomatic presence in central Europe. On the spot investigation convinces me that at present, U.S. embassies in the area have been overwhelmed by the tide of events which has swept over them over the past year. They need our help—now. I, therefore, urge the Department of State to assign, without delay, at least 75 additional members of the Foreign Service to central European countries.

EXPANDED PEACE CORPS PROGRAMS

This June, the United States will, for the first time, be sending 60 Peace Corps volunteers each to Hungary and Poland; the Corps additionally expects to send 40 volunteers to Poland in September to teach all phases of small business management. While in Prague earlier this year, I was told that Czechoslovakia will also play host to the Corps in the near future. The Bush administration has since committed the United States to sending Peace Corps volunteers to that country as well. As promising as these initiatives are, however, the United States should be doing much more to expand Peace Corps programs throughout central Europe. Why? Because America's most important contribution to central Europe derives from our ability and readiness to help these countries become full-fledged members of the Western intellectual, social, economic, and cultural community.

As central Europe shelves the compulsory teaching of Russian, the demand for fluency in English alone promises to grow by leaps and bounds. One major U.S. initiative should accordingly be the export of hundreds, if not thousands, of Peace Corps volunteers to these countries to teach the English language. There will be more than enough takers. In the eloquent words of Czechoslovakia's new President, Vaclav Havel, "For over 40 years, the soul of each and every Czech was imprisoned." The Peace Corps has the keys to help unlock those souls, not only in Czechoslovakia but throughout central Europe.

My bill meets this challenge by authorizing an additional $50,000,000 for the Peace Corps during fiscal years 1991 through 1993, specifically earmarked for its programs throughout central Europe.

STRENGTHENING U.S. EXPORT FINANCE AND INSURANCE PROGRAMS

We also need to put more resources into our export finance and political risk insurance programs. The situation today, to be sure, could be worse. A decade ago, it should be recalled, the Reagan administration seriously entertained the idea of actually getting rid of the Export Import Bank [Exim]. The Bank was fortunate to have strong support in Congress and the private sector. It survived. Today, the Bush administration and Congress recognize the need for a robust U.S. export finance program throughout the world, prominently including central Europe.

The Bank is doing something more than just sitting on its hands. Under the capable leadership of Exim President John D. Macomber, Exim's exposure in central Europe promises to grow. An Exim team was sent to Poland, Yugoslavia, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia in February; as you are aware, Czechoslovakia has recently qualified for participation in all of the Bank's programs. Now is hardly the time for a reduction in the Bank's modest budget. This view, however, does not appear to be shared by everyone.

My understanding is that the Bank's vital direct loan program, which provides loans to foreign buyers of U.S. exports, is scheduled to be slashed by a whopping $115 million: from $615 million in fiscal year 1990, to $500 million in fiscal year 1991. Far from cutting the direct loan program, my bill calls for an increase of $85 million—to $700 million overall—for fiscal year 1991.

The Overseas Private Investment Corporation [OPIC] no less deserves our support. OPIC presently has been authorized to operate in Hungary and Poland; my bill calls for prompt action to provide similar OPIC exposure for Czechoslovakia and the German Democratic Republic, and a major expansion of its direct investment and loan guaranty programs by earmarking not less than $80 million in fiscal year 1991 for these two activities.

AMERICA NEEDS A REFORMED EXPORT CONTROL SYSTEM

Confronted with a current account deficit of $106 billion for 1989, the United States should be doing everything in its power to significantly improve its export performance. Central Europe's dramatic rejection of economic autarchy and centralized planning provides the United States with an opportunity to do just that. If the United States realistically expects to take advantage of the new market opportunities opening up in central Europe, it must in turn be prepared to undertake some long overdue reforms of its own. A drastic overhaul of our increasingly anachronistic, anticompetitive export control system constitutes an unavoidable first step.

Throughout the post-World War II era, the United States has traditionally taken the most restrictive line on sales of dual-use and technology items to Eastern bloc countries. Historians will one day argue whether it served our ultimate interests to have held out as long as we did against our more accommodating Japanese and European allies who felt less constrained about expanding trade and investment ties with central Europe and the Soviet Union.

One thing is clear today, however: The time for drastic change in our multilateral export control system—the 17-member, Paris-based Coordinating Committee, or Cocom—has clearly arrived. The Eastern bloc, as we once called it, has literally ceased to exist; and with its demise, the need for us to maintain such a cumbersome, anticompetitive, export control bureaucracy has likewise ceased to exist.

My bill does not call for Cocom's wholesale abandonment. As we enter the 1990's, the need for some form of multilateral export control system remains. The ambitiousness and intrusiveness of that system, however, needs to be significantly reduced. My bill attempts to achieve that goal by:

First, working with our Cocom allies in making Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Poland subject to the more liberalized export controls now governing exports to the People's Republic of China [PRC];

Second, establishing, on a case-by-case basis, a set of liberalized criteria for exports to Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Poland which exceed the levels of technology permitted to the People's Republic of Czechoslovakia;

Finally, extension of the two above provisions to the German Democratic Republic: "if the President determines that country is continuing to move toward market liberalization and political pluralism."

Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that my Central European Outreach Act of 1990 will complement and strengthen existing legislation contained in the Support for East European Democracy Act [SEED 1], which applied to Hungary and Poland, as well as followup congressional efforts now being undertaken to extend United States assistance to the rest of central Europe [SEED 2]. In that spirit, I look forward to working with my colleagues on this pressing endeavor.

The text of the bill follows:

H.R. —

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Central European Outreach Act of 1990".

SEC. 2. OFFICE OF EASTERN EUROPEAN AND SOVIET AFFAIRS IN THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

The Secretary of Commerce shall triple the number of professional personnel assigned to the Office of Eastern European and Soviet Affairs of the Department of Commerce. The Secretary shall provide sufficient clerical personnel and other resources to support the increased size of that office.

SEC. 3. ASSIGNMENT OF ADDITIONAL FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS TO CENTRAL EUROPE.

The Congress—

(1) urges that at least 75 additional members of the Foreign Service be assigned to Central European countries, and

(2) declares its intention to provide sufficient additonal funds to carry out paragraph (1).

SEC. 4. PEACE CORPS PROGRAMS IN CENTRAL EUROPEAN COUNTRIES.

There are authorized to be appropriated $50,000,000 for fiscal years 1991 through 1993 to carry out the Peace Corps Act, in addition to any amounts otherwise authorized to be appropriated for the Peace Corps. Amounts appropriated pursuant to this section shall be used to establish and expand Peace Corps programs in Central European countries.

SEC. 5. EXPORT-IMPORT BANK PROGRAMS FOR CENTRAL EUROPE.

(a) ELIGIBILITY.—Notwithstanding section 2(b)(2) of the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945 (12 U.S.C. 635(b)(2)), the Export-Import Bank of the United States may guarantee, insure, finance, extend credit, and participate in the extension of credit in connection with the purchase or lease of any product by Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Yugoslavia, or any agency or national of any such country.

(b) DIRECT LOAN PROGRAM.—

(1) EXPANSION OF PROGRAM.—It is the sense of the Congress that, in order to permit an expansion into Central European counties of the direct loan program of the Export-Import Bank of the United Sates, the ceiling provided in the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1991, on gross obligations for the principal amount of direct loans made by the export-import Bank of the United States for fiscal year 1991 should be at least $85,000,000 higher than the ceiling for fiscal year 1990.

(2) EARMARKING FOR CENTRAL EUROPE.—Not less than $85,000,000 of the amount made available by that Act for such obligations for fiscal year 1991 shall be available only for loans with respect to Central European countries.

SEC. 6. OPIC PROGRAMS FOR CENTRAL EUROPE.

(a) ELIGIBILITY.—Section 239(f) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2199(f)) is amended by inserting "Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic," after "Hungary,".

(b) DIRECT INVESTMENT PROGRAM.—In order to permit an expansion of direct investment by the Overseas Private Investment Corporation into Central European countries, section 235(b) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2195(b)) is amended by striking out "$25,000,000" in the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof "$65,000,000".

(c) LOAN GUARANTY PROGRAM.—

(1) EXPANSION OF PROGRAM.—It is the sense of the Congress that, in order to permit an expansion into Central European countries of the Overseas Private Investment Corporation's loan guaranty program, the ceiling provided in the Foreign Operations, Export Financing, and Related Programs Appropriations Act, 1991, on total commitments by the Overseas Private Investment Corporation to guarantee loans for fiscal year 1991 should be at least $80,000,000 higher than the ceiling for fiscal year 1990.

(2) EARMARKING FOR CENTRAL EUROPE.—Not less than $88,000,000 of the amount made available by that Act for such commitments for fiscal year 1991 shall be available only for loans with respect to Central European countries.

SEC. 7. EXPORT ENHANCEMENT FOR CENTRAL EUROPE.

Section 5 of the Export Administration Act of 1979 (50 U.S.C. 100. 2404) is amended by adding at the end following:

(r) EXPORT ENHANCEMENT FOR CENTRAL EUROPE.—

"(1) ESTABLISHMENT OF AN EXPORT ENHANCEMENT DIFFERENTIAL.—

"(A) COCOM APPROVAL.—The President shall instruct the Secretary of State, in conjunction with the Secretary and the Secretary of Defense and other appropriate Government officials, to seek the approval of the group known as the Coordinating Committee for the removal of controls on exports of goods or technology to Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and Poland that are at a level that does not exceed the level to which exports to the People's Republic of China require only notification of the governments participating in the Coordinating Committee.

"(B) UNITED STATES CONTROLS.—Upon obtaining such approval, the President shall instruct the Secretary of State, the Secretary, and the Secretary of Defense to take such steps as are necessary to implement such level of control within the context of United States law and regulation.

"(2) CRITERIA FOR OTHER TECHNOLOGY EXPORTS.—Exports which exceed the levels of technology permitted to the People's Republic of China that require only notification to the Coordinating Committee shall be processed on a case-by-case basis with the proper referral to the Coordinating Committee. Favorable consideration of an application for approval of an export shall be presumed if the export meets the following criteria:

"(A) The end-user is a legitimate civil or commercial entity.

"(B) The proposed export is reasonable and appropriate in quantity and quality for the stated civil or commercial end use.

"(C) The civil or commercial application is well established in the West and there is no clearly identified direct military application for the proposed export product in Soviet bloc or United States military systems.

"(D) The risk of diversion is inherently limited by the function of the equipment, random on-site inspection, adequate computer use logs or software access controls, or Western participation in the management or operation of the application.

"(E) The proposed export is subject to government-to-government assurances, where applicable and appropriate, under the technology transfer procedures agreed to by the Committee.

"(3) OTHER CENTRAL EUROPEAN COUNTRIES.—The provisions of paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection shall become applicable with respect to the German Democratic Republic if the President determines that that country is continuing to move toward market liberalization and political pluralism.".

SEC. 8. DEFINITION OF CENTRAL EUROPEAN COUNTRY.

As used in this Act, the term "Central European country" means Czechoslovakia, the German Democratic Republic, Hungary, Poland, and Yugoslavia.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Thursday, April 26, 1990

The House met at 11 a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

We pray for all those people of our world, O God, who experience the rich emotions of life. For those who know the joy of reconciliation, reunion, and family, we celebrate with thanksgiving; for those who are anxious in their lives, and who know concern for the days ahead, we offer our petitions for Your healing presence and assurance of faith. May Your peace that passes all human understanding be with each one, this day and every day. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ROSE] please come forward and lead the House in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. ROSE led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce that we will take seven 1-minute statements on each side of the aisle.

HOUSE BUDGET IS MOST COMPETITIVE

(Mr. WISE of West Virginia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, as the House becomes locked in its annual fiscal combat called the budget battle, and the budget resolution, I think it is important to look at the different budgets that will be offered, particularly the President's budget, the Bush budget, and the Democratic alternative, the Democratic budget that was reported out by the House Committee on the Budget, and a few findings that I think are essential.

We talk of competitiveness and the need to compete in the education for our children, compete with foreign trading partners abroad, and look at the line item for DARPA, the basic research, DARPA that helps stimulate basic research basically for the military, and as I see that above the baseline, the House budget resolution is $100 million in budget authority, and yet the President would strike $181 million below the baseline. That is no surprise since he fired the director of DARPA just the other day. Under function 450, community development block grants helping rural and urban communities keep abreast, the House budget adds $200 million, and the President strikes $280 million. Under Economic Development Administration, the House adds $77 million above the baseline, and the President strikes $203 million. Rural development, the House budget adds $75 million, and apparently the President does not like rural development areas, because he strikes $199 million.

It is very clear when we compare the House budget and what it does to make America competitive versus the President's budget, the House budget is the most competitive budget and wins every time.

NICARAGUA DESERVES UNITED STATES SUPPORT

(Mr. CHANDLER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I had the great pleasure of being in Managua yesterday to witness the inaugural of Violeta Chamorro, the democratically elected President of Nicaragua. It was a day of festivity, a national holiday, a great celebration, and it was a joy to see Nicaraguans waving blue and white banners and the excitement of a new breath of freedom.

It was a proud day for Nicaraguans, and I think it was a proud day for Americans because of the role we have played. It was certainly a proud day for me personally. However, in all candor, I have to tell the Members that is only part of the story. Problems for Nicaragua are far from over. Nicaragua is a desperately poor and bitterly divided country. I viewed with great personal satisfaction the peaceful transition of power taking place in that country, but I also came away very concerned. I came away more committed than ever to see economic stability and political stability return to that country.

I think we can say that the policies of the United States over the last 10 years have contributed to this burst of freedom in Nicaragua. But now, instead of walking away with any satisfaction, we must redouble our efforts to see to it that that freedom continues to succeed and to survive. One basic element, one key to that is for the United States to have the confidence of the people who were chosen as leaders of Nicaragua to make decisions for that country, and to support them in the decisions they reach.

THREATS ON UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, American trade law says specifically that any foreign government who maintains a persistent pattern of discrimination against American products and whose unfair trade practices threaten the stability of America and American commerce shall be cited by the President for action. Last year, the President cited Japan for that reason. Nothing has changed.

Now, this year the Trade Representative is saying, "Mr. President, don't do it. Even though nothing has changed, Japan has made promises." Japan has made promises. They do it every time. The American workers do not want promises, they want action. Things are so bad around here I think we should send the IRS to Europe, the EPA to Japan, the Trade Representative to Korea, the Commerce Department to Taiwan and let them screw up those countries and then maybe we will get something done with our own.

If we do not act on trade now, we let Japan off the hook, and America is going to have a depression in the future to make the '29 crash look like a fender bender. Do your job, Trade Representative, do your job.

UNITED STATES EMBASSY IN EL SALVADOR ON TOP OF THE JESUIT MURDER CASE

(Mr. SHUSTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SHUSTER. Mr. Speaker, recently there has been some criticism of our Embassy's handling of the Jesuit murder case in El Salvador. Because of the extraordinary nature of those brutal killings and allegations about high-level military involvement, as a member of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence and the senior Republican in our delegation investigating this matter, I have read the sensitive material classified and unclassified on this case, from the very beginning. I can report to this House categorically that the complaints about our Embassy are unfair and uninformed. The evidence is very clear that our Embassy along with President Cristiani, has been pushing hardest since day one to get to the bottom of these murders.

There is room for criticisms, but it should be leveled at the Salvadoran judge who has been sitting on his hands, not vigorously pursuing obvious leads in this case. The Democratic chairman of our delegation, who has been very fair, has also had the opportunity to read the sensitive information in this case. Our Embassy and our Ambassador, William Walker, in particular, deserve great credit for their diligence.

MONTANANS SAY NO TO ANTI-SEMITISM

(Mr. WILLIAMS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, on Monday of this week the Montana Council for International Visitors canceled a scheduled May 6-May 9 visit to Montana by eight Soviet authors. The visitor program service of Meridan House International, which is a private Washington-based organization that plans itinerary for the U.S. Information Agency has now been notified that this particular group of authors is not welcome because of their anti-Semitism.

I commend Janine Pease-Windy Boy for her courage and statements opposing racism. Ms. Pease-Windy Boy is president of Little Big Horn College on the Crow Reservation, and as president of this institution, she has often welcomed international visitors and served as one of Montana's hosts. She "decided not to extend * * * hospitality to a group of anti-Semetic people who mean poorly toward a whole group of people in Russia."

As a Crow Indian, Ms. Pease-Windy Boy states:

> My own life experience as a native person has taught me that racism is a very difficult thing to deal with on a daily basis. I considered their rights of free speech, but Little Big Horn College's very existence is based on exerting a stance for human rights.

At a time in our history when we see a rise in hate groups and groups which profess that one race is better than another, I am proud that my fellow Montanans have said no, you are not welcome here. It was, the strong voice of an individual Montana Crow Indian woman leader who took a stand, not only for the college she directs but for the direction of the State and the Nation.

PAC CONTRIBUTION REFORM URGED

(Mr. BUNNING asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BUNNING. Mr. Speaker, I can understand why the Members of the House on the Democrat side of the aisle are reluctant to enter meaningful negotiations on campaign reform or on legislation to restrict Political Action Committee contributions.

PAC money has become a massive incumbent protection slush fund. Democrat incumbents receive over half of their total contributions from PAC's—51.5 percent. And it is understandable that they do not want to derail their gravy train.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have to do something. America is losing confidence in our political system because the individual contributor has been shoved out of the process.

It obviously is time for some bipartisan statesmanship. And I would urge my colleagues on the other side of the aisle to seriously consider reducing the maximum PAC contribution, raising the maximum for individual contributors and capping the total PAC contributions allowable in a campaign.

I realize that this would require a greater sacrifice on the other side of the aisle but it is time to quit paying lip service to reform and actually do something.

APPOINTMENT AS MEMBERS OF THE UNITED STATES DELEGATION OF THE MEXICO-UNITED STATES INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Mr. DELAY of Texas;
Mr. GILMAN of New York; and
Mr. GOODLING of Pennsylvania.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 1465, OIL POLLUTION ACT OF 1989

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the previous order of February 7, 1990, the Chair supplements the appointment of conferees on the bill (H.R. 1465) to establish limitations on liability for damages resulting from oil pollution, to establish a fund for the payment of compensation for such damages, and for other purposes, as follows:

From the Committee on Ways and Means, for consideration of title VII and sections 1001(10), 1006(f), 1006(g)(4), 4302, 8102(f) of the House bill and so much of section 8202 of the House bill as would add a new section 210(c)(5) to the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act, and sections 103(b), 103(c), 356, 401(b), and 512 of the Senate amendment, and modifications committed to conference:

Messrs. ROSTENKOWSKI, GIBBONS, PICKLE, RANGEL, STARK, ARCHER, VANDER JAGT, and CRANE.

The Clerk will notify the Senate of the change in conferees.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 4493

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as a cosponsor of H.R. 4493.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

A TURNING-POINT BUDGET

(Mr. SCHUMER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, the budget that we will commence to debate this morning is a turning-point budget. It is not everything that we all would have asked for, but it is a very significant budget. It is indeed a budget of which this Chamber can be proud.

It is a turning point in two areas: First, the real deficit under this budget will fall under $100 billion. When we consider that our GNP is now $4.5 trillion, that $100 billion deficit, while still too high, certainly represents a mark below which the Congress can be proud of, because it indicates that we are finally getting a handle on the deficit with which we have wrestled through the 1980's.

Second, the budget finally begins a shift in priorities away from the cold war and toward our new war, a friendly war but a very real war of economic competition.

We must reduce the deficit to increase our savings rate, but we also must start building up our human capital, our education, and our infrastructure, and every time we waste extra dollars on a cold war that may not happen and do not put those dollars into either deficit reduction or the building up of our economic resources, which is going to keep us No. 1, we are wasting time and missing opportunities. This budget does both.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to give this budget a careful look and vote for it.

THE PAC GAP GIVES ADVANTAGE TO INCUMBENTS

(Mr. OXLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OXLEY. Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court is supposed to be the branch of our Government where members serve as long as they wish, not the House of Representatives.

A significant reason why incumbent Members practically never lose elections is the flow of large amounts of special interest PAC money to incumbents. Let us look at some numbers.

Mr. Speaker, here is a chart showing the "PAC gap," the huge advantage special interest PAC money gives incumbents over challengers. In 1980, the PAC gap was too large with 61 percent PAC money going to incumbents, while only 26 percent went to challengers. Unfortunately, the PAC gap has become significantly larger, with 74 percent of PAC money going to incumbents in 1988 and only 12 percent to challengers.

Mr. Speaker, we need to restore electoral competition to this body and to do that we have to reduce the PAC gap. Mr. Speaker, give us a vote on reducing the PAC contribution limit and let the American people see who the real protectors of special interest money are.

ESPY SLAMS JUNK BUDGET

(Mr. ESPY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ESPY. Mr. Speaker, this week promoters of junk bonds have been taking a beating on our front pages. Well, promoters of junk budgets should also take their beatings. Specifically, I refer to the budget of this administration.

As a rural American, I feel that the administration's budget ignores world changes and ignores my 60 million fellow rural constituents and residents. In contrast, the House Budget Committee, of which I am a member, recognizes the revolutionary changes around the world and remembers all the aspects of our diverse Nation.

Let us just take a look for a second at some of the real proposals from both budgets. The President proposes to cut $116 million for water grants. In contrast, our budget calls for maintaining current spending, plus adding $75 million for various Farmers Home Administration programs. The President's budget cuts community development block grants by $11 million. Our budget proposes a $48 million increase.

The President proposes to cut rural housing by $695 million. In contrast, we propose to raise it by $53 million.

Mr. Speaker, there is a peace dividend, but we must be so careful to invest it wisely. We must not invest it in junk budgets. Our committee's budget finally gives a positive answer to those millions of Americans who have been asking the question: "What about us?"

A REPORT ON YESTERDAY'S INAUGURATION IN NICARAGUA

(Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, yesterday was a great day for the people of Nicaragua and for the advancement of freedom in the world. I was honored to be a representative of the United States Government at the inauguration of Violeta Chamorro as the new President of Nicaragua.

But all did not go well. The divisions in Nicaragua remain deep, as we saw when the Sandinista supporters bombarded the new President with water balloons as she entered the stadium for her inauguration.

There is democracy in Nicaragua, but it is still fragile and we must in this country continue our commitment to help that country and our neighbors in Nicaragua as it makes its difficult transition into the democratic world.

NATIONAL VOLUNTEER WEEK

(Mr. SPRATT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Speaker, we have so many commemoratives that they begin to lose meaning, but this week is National Volunteer Week, and it has real meaning for the people in my State who suffered from Hurricane Hugo. Today Sumter, SC, will dedicate a park to honor the people who came from all over and volunteered their help in the wake of Hurricane Hugo. It is their way of remembering, their way of saying: "Thank you," and their way of calling attention now and forever to the volunteers who cleared streets, and hauled water, and patched roofs and brought help in all forms.

Mr. Speaker, this is a good time for all of us to remember the communities and what the name implies, places where people share burdens as well as benefits. The heroes of Hurricane Hugo embodied that spirit. They came in the best tradition of American volunteers, and I am pleased to join my constituents in Sumter, SC, and extend to all of them everywhere our heartfelt thanks.

REMOVAL OF NAME OF MEMBER AS COSPONSOR OF H.R. 4308 AND H.R. 2403

Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my name be removed as a cosponsor of two bills, H.R. 4308 and H.R. 2403. My name was inadvertently placed on the list of cosponsors for these bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WISE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

THE CHALLENGE OF NUMBERS

(Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SLAUGHTER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month the National Research Council through its Committee on the Mathematical Sciences in the Year 2000 issued a report called The Challenge of Numbers. This report, which was reviewed by the National Academy of Sciences, the National Academy of Engineering, and the National Institute of Medicine, offers sobering, new evidence that the United States has problems in mathematical science education at all levels, elementary, high school, and postsecondary.

Consider, for example, Mr. Speaker, that in 1977, 80 percent of all doctoral degrees awarded in mathematics in this country went to U.S. citizens. By 1988, this figure had fallen to less than half. The young people are finding the transition from high school to college mathematics more difficult, and relatively few women and minorities are studying mathematics. Recent National Science Foundation predictions point to a shortage of a half million scientists and engineers by the year 2000. As the report states:

> Because of the fundamental role of mathematics in support of science and engineering, the problems in the U.S. educational system will not be corrected unless the problems in mathematics education are corrected.

FUTURE GROWTH OF U.S. JOB MARKET TIED TO MATHEMATICS

(Mr. PICKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month, the National Research Council, through its Committee on the Mathematical Sciences in the Year 2000, issued a report called, The Challenge of Numbers.

This report, which was reviewed by the National Academy of Sciences, the National Academy of Engineering, and the Institute of Medicine, offers sobering new evidence that the United States has problems in mathematical sciences education at all levels—elementary, high school, and postsecondary.

Because of the fundamental role of mathematics in support of science and engineering, the problems in the U.S. educational system will not be corrected unless the problems in mathematics education are corrected.

Mr. Speaker, to remain competitive, this Nation must establish "a national agenda for renewal and revitalization of the mathematical sciences along with a strategy for implementation that will stimulate all sectors of our society into action."

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair amends its previous order and will allow one more 1-minute speech from each side.

OPPOSING EFFORTS TO WEAKEN SAFETY STANDARDS IN OUR UNDERGROUND MINES

(Mr. POSHARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. POSHARD. Mr. Speaker, how much more are the coal miners of this country going to have to take? As if the prospect of unemployment forced by an unfair clean air bill was not enough, now the agency charged with protecting the safety of those who have jobs wants to relax its standards. My goodness; where does it all end? How many more mine disasters do we have to endure before we decide enough is enough?

Mr. Speaker, I oppose the Mine Safety and Health Administration's efforts to weaken ventilation and safety-related standards in our underground mines. Let me read from the report issued by the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health which reviewed MSHA's proposed changes. I quote:

The use of belt entry air to ventilate the working faces is not a safe practice, and allowance of the use of belt entry air to ventilate the working areas of a mine is a diminution of the protection of the miners' safety and health as provided by the Mine Safety and Health Act of 1977.

Mr. Speaker, it takes courage to go down into the mines each day. It should be the Government's role to make sure that that trip is a safe one and not fraught with more dangers.

H.R. 4355 AND THE GOLD MEDAL OF HONOR

(Mr. WALSH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of the Members a bill I have recently introduced, H.R. 4355, legislation providing Gold Star lapel pins to the dependents of every member of the Armed Forces who die as a result of an injury or illness sustained in the line of duty.

Until 1958, a Gold Medal of Honor, a lapel pin, was given to family members of all servicemen and women who were killed in the line of duty. In 1958, however, that law was changed. Only those who were killed while engaged in a conflict with a foreign enemy were awarded such recognition. This has created a serious problem in my opinion.

Let me give you two examples of deficiencies created by the present law. The first was given to me by a spokesperson for the Gold Star Mother's Association in my district. A pilot, who after having flown 28 missions in Vietnam, flew his 29th in a bombing mission over Cambodia. Upon returning to his aircraft carrier the plane failed to negotiate the landing when the arrester cable snapped, sending the plane careening off the ship. The pilot was killed.

Unfortunately the family of this pilot was not eligible to receive the Gold Star lapel pin. The reason involved a technicality relating to the fact that the United States was not formally at war with Cambodia and therefore not engaged in conflict with a foreign enemy.

The second example I would like to bring forward relates to the recent tragedy that occurred on the U.S.S. Iowa. Several young sailors lost their lives, but the families of these men are not eligible to receive the lapel pin. Although these men were participating in practice wartime maneuvers at sea, no armed conflict existed at the time.

My bill simply changes the law back to its original form by awarding all members of the armed services who die in the line of duty a Gold Star lapel pin. The families of our brave service personnel deserve this small token of respect and appreciation from their country. I hope all my colleagues will join me in support of this legislation.

PROVIDING FOR FURTHER CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 310, CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1991

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 382 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 382

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310) setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995. After general debate, the concurrent resolution shall be considered as having been read for amendment under the five-minute rule. No amendment to the concurrent resolution shall be in order except the amendments printed in the report of the Committee on Rules accompanying this resolution. Said amendments shall be considered in the order and manner specified in the report and all points of order against the amendments are hereby waived. Said amendments shall be considered as having been read and shall be debatable for the time specified in the report, equally divided and controlled by the proponent and a Member opposed thereto. Said amendments shall not be subject to amendment. If more than one of the amendments in the nature of a substitute made in order by this resolution has been adopted, only the last such amendment which has been adopted shall be considered as having been finally adopted in the Committee of the Whole and reported back to the House. It shall be in order to consider the amendment or amendments provided in section 305(a)(5) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended, necessary to achieve mathematical consistency. At the conclusion of the consideration of the concurrent resolution for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the concurrent reoslution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the concurrent resolution to final adoption without intervening motion.

□ 1130

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MOAKLEY] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN], and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 382 is a modified open rule providing for the further consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 310, the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1991.

The rule provides that no amendments to the concurrent resolution are in order except the amendments printed in the report accompanying this resolution. The amendments are to be considered in the manner and order specified in the report and all points of order are waived against the amendments.

The rule further provides that the amendments are not subject to amendment and each amendment will be considered under a specified amount of time.

Mr. Speaker, the rule also provides that the amendments are to be considered under the king of the hill procedure. As Members know, under this procedure if more than one amendment is adopted only the last amendment adopted will be considered as having been finally adopted in the Committee of the Whole and will be reported back to the House.

The amendments will be considered in the following order: First, the substitute to be offered by Representative KASICH, debatable for 1 hour; second, the substitute to be offered by Representative DANNEMEYER, debatable for 1 hour; third, the substitute to be offered by Representative DELLUMS, the Black Caucus quality of life budget, debatable for 2 hours; and fourth, the substitute to be offered by Representative FRENZEL, the President's budget, debatable for 2 hours.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the rule makes in order the customary amendment or amendments provided in section 305(a) of the Budget Act that would make the numbers contained in the budget resolution mathematically consistent.

Mr. Speaker, the committee heard from several Members wishing to offer amendments transferring amounts among the functions or changing the amount for a single function. None of those amendments are in order under this rule.

As in the past, the committee has made in order only those amendments that represent major alternatives to the Budget Committee's product.

The budget debate should be devoted to broad questions of priorities and fiscal policy. Line-item amendments on particular programs and transfer amendments will inevitably and more properly be addressed in the authorization and appropriations process. Whatever the totals in a budget resolution, there will be other opportunities—from the 302(b) allocations to the debate on individual bills—to reallocate discretionary amounts.

It is time to move the process along. It is time for the House to act and stake out a position on budget policy. The resolution before us presents a responsible 5-year budget plan. The deficit in each fiscal year would be lower than required by Gramm-Rudman.

If the Social Security surplus is counted—as required by the Gramm-Rudman law—the budget would be in balance by 1993. If the Social Security surplus is not counted, the Budget Committee resolution reaches balance by 1995.

In each of the 5 years, the amount of deficit reduction exceeds the President's budget. Over the 5 years, the reductions are composed of roughly one-third tax increases and two-thirds spending cuts. Most importantly, the resolution provides investment initiatives to rebuild America and to restore our competitive edge.

Mr. Speaker, the budget would also provide additional funds to improve our roads, bridges, highways, and airways; to improve our children's lives, by increasing participation in Head Start and nutrition programs for women, infants and children; to fight crime and the scourge of drugs; to help emerging democracies; to conserve and protect the environment and to foster the development of new technologies.

Mr. Speaker, this is a fair rule to provide for the further consideration of the budget resolution. I urge adoption of the rule.

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, as always, a gracious thank you to the gracious gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. Speaker, there are two annual rites of spring in our Nation's Capital: The cherry blossoms and the congressional budget resolution. And true to form for this Government town, neither one ever blooms on time. The cherry blossoms are occasionally early and the budget resolution is always late. This year the cherry blossoms were about 2 weeks early and the budget resolution is already about 2 weeks late.

The other thing these two spring rites have in common is that neither one bears real fruit. Both are heralded with great fanfare, pomp, and ceremony. We stand in awe at the beauty of the cherry blossoms, just as we marvel at the ability of the Budget Committee to reach its Gramm-Rudman deficit target. And yet, when the parade has passed and the cheering has faded, we are left holding an empty bushel basket: No cherries and no real deficit reductions. We are left only with faded, fallen petals and magic asterisks which denote "savings to be specified at a later date."

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to give the impression that the budget process is meaningless. As one who had the privilege of serving on the Budget Committee, even for a while as the acting ranking Republican, I have the greatest respect for the process and for those who have the thankless task of serving on that committee.

I think we are all especially fortunate to have members like the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] as the chairman and ranking Republican on that committee. And as I mentioned in the Rules Committee this week, we will all be the poorer when Mr. FRENZEL retires at the end of this Congress. His absence will leave a great, unfillable void in this House for a long time to come, and I am deeply saddened by his loss to this institution.

Having said all that, I think we all recognize the limits and failings of the current process, and they are certainly due to no fault of the current Budget Committee leadership or its membership.

The fault, dear Brutus, lies not in those Budget Committee stars, but in ourselves. I think it is amusing that there are some Members calling for the repeal of the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction process on grounds that it forces us to resort to gimmicks and games. I can assure you that there is nothing in that act that forces us to do any such thing. The fact is that we invented those gimmicks and games as a substitute for the hard choices Gramm-Rudman was designed to force us to make.

To add insult to illogic, these same Gramm-Rudman critics would have us repeal sequestration in order to eliminate budgetary gimmicks and games. Now that would be the ultimate in gimmicks if they could pull it off: Abolish the only credible discipline and action-forcing mechanism we have in the whole budget process, and somehow we will act more responsibly. If you believe that, you are living in the magic kingdom.

Mr. Speaker, the real reason some want to abolish sequestration is because it is working too well. It is the only threat around that forces us to eventually confront reality. The only problem is that we do not face reality until it is on top of us around the beginning of October. As a result, we procrastinate and consequently endload the whole process. So we already hear talk about the real budget being produced sometime later this year by a budget summit after we find ourselves deadlocked on appropriations and reconciliation and under a sequester. That is the historic track record of this Congress, and that is probably the way things will play out again.

In the meantime, we are told to get this preliminary and somewhat sketchy budget processs on track now so that maybe we can accelerate that final day of fiscal reckoning. The Rules Committee is more than happy to accommodate those wishes by bringing you our traditional little spring game of "King-of-the-Hill." And if you all feel a little like Sisyphus after pushing your respective stones up this budget hill, just wait until we approach the real summit next fall with the big boulder. Maybe this will condition us for the heavy lifting to come.

Under the terms of this rule, once we complete the 6 hours of general debate, we will consider just four substitutes under a king-of-the-hill process whereby the last one adopted will be the one reported back to the House. The amendments will be considered in the order listed in the report of the Rules Committee on this rule, must be offered by the Member specified or a designee, will not be subject to amendment, and will be debated for the time specified in the report. The four substitutes and the time allotted are as follows: First, the Kasich soft freeze budget, 1 hour; second, the Dannemeyer hard freeze budget, 1 hour; third, the Dellums-Black Caucus budget, 2 hours; and fourth, the Frenzel-administration budget, 2 hours.

If none of the substitutes is adopted, the House would then vote on the Budget Committee's budget on final passage. There is no motion to recommit allowed under the Budget Act.

Mr. Speaker, the Rules Committee did receive testimony from six other Members, four Democrats and two Republicans, who asked that their so-called transfer or cut-and-bite amendment be made in order to one or more of the substitutes. However, the committee has followed a precedent established several years ago to only make in order comprehensive budget substitutes. This policy was established so that the House could focus on the macroeconomic or fiscal picture rather than spend a large amount of time on microeconomic or programmatic amendments. The decision not to make in order these six amendments was in no way intended to be a judgment on the merits of those amendments. Frankly, they all had some merit. But I think my colleagues can understand where reopening the process to programmatic amendments could lead. We have been there before.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Budget Committee majority probably did as best it could at this time under difficult political circumstances. However, I would be derelict in my duties if I did not point out that the Democrats' budget employs, indeed expands upon, the same assumptions and devices its partisans criticized the President for using when his budget was unveiled last January 29.

I will not turn those partisan shots back on the Democrats' budget by declaring it either "dead on arrival" or "all smoke and mirrors." Both budgets are obviously alive and kicking under this rule, even if their windows on the fiscal horizon may be a little clouded.

I have no doubt all this will be cleared up before this year is out. And the best way to get on with that is to stop pointing fingers or sitting on our hands, and instead to start putting our collective hands to the wheel and drive this process to a successful conclusion. That is what the American people expect of us, and I think we are worthy of that challenge. I urge adoption of this rule.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1991

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WISE). Pursuant to House Resolution 382 and rule XXIII, the Chair declares the House in the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 310.

□ 1143

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995, with Mr. MCNULTY (Chairman pro tempore) in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. MCNULTY). When the Committee of the Whole House rose on Wednesday, April 25, 1990, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] had 1 hour and 21 minutes of general debate time remaining, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] had 1 hour and 47 minutes remaining.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, it is the intention of the committee to provide 50 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] from the Black Caucus, to use that time as he wishes for general debate, and then retain the balance of the time for the committee.

Our intention is to try to see if we can keep our debate to roughly an hour, give or take a few minutes as need requires, and to try to limit it as much as possible so that we can move into the amendment process hopefully sometime between 1 and 1:30.

In that spirit, Mr. Chairman, I would first start off by yielding 4 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK].

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time and for the excellent work that he did.

Mr. Chairman, no budget that anyone brings forward is going to be pleasing in general, because one cannot judge a budget absent the context. The context is a serious level of debt in the country, a commitment that we have to reduce the deficit, problems that have grown, particularly during the past decade as housing and health care and education and the environment and other important issues have been underfunded.

What the budget does, and we have choices, but we will have on Tuesday the quality-of-life budget which comes from our colleagues in the Congressional Black Caucus and elsewhere for which I intend to vote which seems to me to be an excellent balance of our interests. In the event that that fails, I will, however, enthusiastically support the budget that has come out of the Committee on the Budget and oppose that which has been put forward by the President.

There are a lot of similarities obviously. Economic assumptions are similar. Proposals for increased revenues are similiar. So we can focus on the differences.

The biggest difference is a pair difference. The budget which the Committee on the Budget put forward has less for the military and more for the Medicare Program, and the President's budget is, of course, the opposite. The President's budget proposes very substantial cuts in the Medicare Program from the baseline figure that will be needed simply to hold it even, and it proposes marginal cuts in the military.

The budget we have intelligently begins the process of reducing the military. People have said, "Why are we doing that? Are we saying there is no threat?" Hardly.

We have a budget which continues in existence; Trident submarines which prowl these oceans undetected and have MIRV warheads to unleash in our defense. We have a budget which continues to provide for well over 200,000 troops in Europe, more, in my judgment, than we need. We have carrier battle groups all over the world. The military number in our budget will have an America that is stronger than any other nation in the world, particularly with the disarray that is affecting the Soviet Union, with the difficulty the Soviet Union has.

What do we do, however, with regard to the military? We begin to say that Poland and Hungary are highly unlikely to invade France.

The President's budget is based on the assumption that we must defend France, Denmark, West Germany, Italy, and others from an invasion force in which a Russian general arms the Polish, Hungarian, Czech, East German, and Bulgarian armies and says, "Follow me." I do not think that there is a Russian general so dumb. I do not think that there is any realistic possibility whatsoever of that happening.

We are continuing a policy in NATO under the President's proposal of keeping a large American troop presence in Western Europe to defend our allies who are now our economic equals against a threat that is not happening. I am not now talking about the internal problems of the Soviet Union. Nothing in this budget reduces our ability, in my judgment, to deter nuclear war from the Soviet Union.

We do say that the Warsaw Pact, thank God, has ceased to exist, that Poland, Hungary, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, and Bulgaria in varying degrees have asserted their freedom, and they simply will not be part of a Russian military push against the West, and that is one of the key differences. If Members think it is realistic that the Warsaw Pact will be revived and invade, then they should not vote for the budget which the Committee on the Budget brought forward.

Then we have the issue of Japan. One of the least intelligent public policies in this country today is our policy of subsidizing the defense of Japan. We have billions of dollars that we spend in Japan, and the Japanese compensate us for less than half of that.

I am in favor of an alliance. But why do some of the people at our executive level always define alliance in terms of our subsidizing them?

We are told we have to reassure the allies. Mr. Chairman, why do the allies not ever reassure us? I am as prone to nervousness as they are. Why, when we are talking about people who are our economic equals, our allies, must it be that we always subsidize their defense rather than vice versa? We are not talking isolationism. We are not talking retreat. We are talking about a realistic assessment of two factors.

There is greater capacity of our allies, and the threat has diminished. Our budget that the Committee on the Budget put forward is the only one between that and the President that recognizes that fact.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, last September, Federal Reserve Board Gov. Wayne Angell made a strong case in Moscow that the Soviet Union should introduce far-reaching reform measures involving gold as a means to provide fiscal and monetary discipline. He explained that the Soviet government could borrow at 3 percent interest, to quote him verbatim, "Soviet gold bonds would be snapped up in London and New York, putting capital at their disposal at the lowest cost available in the world, lower even than Japan's." He added that the gold ruble would bring about long-term price stability, and would instantly increase the savings rate of the Soviet people.

As Judy Shelton, a fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institute whose specialty is international economics and who is an expert on the Soviet economy, observed in the Wall Street Journal, February 27, 1990, only gold could save the Soviets, provided that the United States simultaneously adopted the same kind of fiscal and monetary reform Governor Angell has prescribed for the terminally ill Soviet economy. Only with the cooperation of the United States can the dollar price of gold be stabilized. Without this stability the Soviet Union would be buffeted by the changes in the price of gold, and could experience a run on its gold reserves. According to Dr. Shelton, the United States would be doing itself a financial favor by assisting the Soviets toward fiscal and monetary discipline. If the Soviets could borrow at 3 percent then the United States, for the stronger reason, could borrow at less than 2 percent. I have talked to Governor Angell and Dr. Shelton, and they agree with my proposition that gold-bond financing would bring similar or greater benefits to our Government and our people than it would to the Soviets. In due course, I shall offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which does incorporate the principles propounded by Governor Angell and Dr. Shelton into the budget for fiscal 1991.

The interest-rate reduction on the debt, due to converting the short-term debt as it matures into gold-bonded long-term debt, would be translated into cumulative savings for the taxpayer on the following scale:

CUMULATIVE SAVINGS IN DEBT-SERVICING COSTS DUE TO INTEREST RATE REDUCTION

Year:	Cumulative savings [In billions of dollars]
1	39
2	133
3	254
4	394
5	547
6	710
7	883
8	1,061
9	1,245
10	1,433

Thus in less than 5 years we could save half a trillion dollars just in interest money. Any savings in the defense budget would be additional. Only this gold dividend, averaging well over $100 billion a year, would make a dent in our monstrous deficits. Those dreaming about the so-called peace dividend could not convincingly present a fraction of the savings which my gold-dividend plan would produce as far down the line as the eye can see.

Furthermore, unless we take the gold dividend first, the peace dividend will remain an illusion. Only the gold bond plan can end the zero-sum game between the two superpowers, whereby our loss is their gain and vice versa. The deep-seated suspicion about Soviet intentions in this country has not been and will not be removed by perestroika and glasnost alone. It will take bilateral measures, such as Dr. Shelton is talking about, before any peace dividend can be realized.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to my main criticism of the committee budget. The proposed cuts in defense spending are not realistic, in view of the yawning gap between Soviet words and acts. Missile production in the Soviet Union doubled between 1986 and 1989 in the ICBM category, and it leveled out but did not decrease in other categories. There is no sign of meaningful reductions in Soviet production of military aircraft, submarines, and major surface warships for the period under review. We should exercise the greatest caution regarding any unilateral reduction in the level of our military preparedness, and restrain our urge to claim the peace dividend, in view of present Soviet efforts to lull us into a sense of false security. Thirty years ago Khrushchev made significant unilateral cuts far more drastic than those announced by Gorbachev so far. He reduced the size of the standing Soviet army by 1 million men or by 36 divisions. In addition he withdrew 14 divisions from his European satellite countries. Yet even a reduction of this magnitude left his successor Brezhnev with a force of over 3.3 million men under arms, or 140 divisions, and more than 35,000 tanks deployed in the field. Consequently, Gorbachev was in command of a force comprising over 5.5 million men organized into 214 divisions, with some 53,000 tanks, in early 1989.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot afford to take the risky peace dividend, unless we are prepared to take the risk-free gold dividend first.

The main feature that distinguishes the budget alternative that this Member from California will be offering relates to what we will be spending in interest on the national debt during fiscal year 1991. The projection from the Congressional Budget Office, as well as OMB, is that the gross interest expense in fiscal year 1991 will total approximately $270 billion.

Now, one finds in looking at the records produced by CBO and OMB that we list the interest expense projected for 1991 at $184 billion.

Sometimes Members and the public ask, and are entitled to have an answer to the question, what is the gimmick? What is the true cost of interest on the national debt?

The net interest expense of $184 billion in the baseline estimate is developed because it does not take into consideration the interest that the Treasury has to pay on the bonds held by the trust funds of the U.S. Government, which total around $100 billion.

That interest paid by the Treasury, all of us, on bonds held by the trust funds, is reflected by the increase in the national debt. Because even though we may be claiming that we will comply with Gramm-Rudman targets of some $62 billion for fiscal year 1991, the truth of the matter is that the true measure of the deficit is how much we will increase the national debt by.

The reality is that in fiscal year 1991 we will increase the national debt by some $245.9 billion.

We are going to increase the national debt on our current plan during the decade of the nineties by about $200 billion a year as far as the eye can see, provided we do not have a recession. Which means that by the turn of the century, the year 2000, this Nation will be looking at a debt of $3 trillion, but closer to $6 trillion. The growth of the debt beyond that is exponential.

What I am saying is that it is long past time that we reform the monetary system of this Government and reduce the cost of interest in maintaining our national debt.

One of the unfortunate aspects of how we are managing the fiscal affairs of this Government is that in this current year we are using about $125 billion of trust fund money to reduce a general fund deficit of a quarter of a trillion down to the claimed level of $123 billion in compliance with Gramm-Rudman.

This Nation witnessed a tragedy with the evangelist Mr. Jim Bakker, who about a year ago was found to have taken trust fund money for general fund purposes. What did our system do to Mr. Bakker for having taken trust fund money, taken from the faithful to build Heritage Village, and used for general fund purposes? We put the gentleman in jail for 45 years. This is what happens to people in the private sector who take trust fund money for general fund purposes.

I would say the time is long past when we in the Congress should be discontinuing this practice as well. We can sell a gold-backed bond in world markets for 2-percent interest or less. We are currently paying 8 percent. If we take six points off the cost of maintaining $3 trillion of our national debt, we will reduce the interest expense annually by between $150 billion and $180 billion of the cost of maintaining our national debt. That to me represents the best way of reducing spending at the Federal level, by reducing the cost of interest in maintaining the national debt, and it presents an opportunity for saying to the American people we can truly have a balanced budget.

□ 1200

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUCKABY], a member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise as a reluctant supporter of the bill that is before us, the budget of the chairman of the Budget Committee. I would have preferred to have a bill that did not have an additional $6 billion of expenditures in it.

That $6 billion contains something for everyone, additional money for States, additional money for education, additional money for welfare programs, additional money for our infrastructure, for transportation programs, all good expenditures, but we are not paying for it.

I would have preferred a budget that did not cut our budget authority in defense quite as deep as it does. I think we are getting a little bit ahead of ourselves at this point in time.

But the good points about the chairman's mark are that it contains real deficit reduction, more than any other budget that has ever been passed by this House of Representatives. Let us look at what it does.

In outlays it cuts defense $11.5 billion, nondefense discretionary programs by almost $1 billion, and entitlement programs more than $4 billion in cuts. It increases user fees from $1.5 billion, and increases taxes $13.9 billion. Yes, it increases taxes, the same amount as President Bush proposed. And if we take into account, add all of these things up, plus the then $1.2 billion of reduction in interest, we have a real deficit reduction of $33 billion.

The issue in our day, this year in Congress, is to regain control of our economic destiny, to be able to control our interest rates, and we are only going to be able to do that by reducing the size of the Federal deficit so that we are no longer dependent upon Tokyo, upon the Japanese, upon the big Japanese insurance companies coming in month after month and buying 30 percent of our long-term debt. That is the major issue facing this Congress this year, and the chairman's mark makes significant progress in narrowing this budget deficit, and it is the only plan before us that can be passed. Hence, it is time we get on with the Nation's business.

I would urge my colleagues to support the chairman's budget.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH], the sponsor of a principal amendment to be voted on today and a member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Let me tell Members why I am going forward with this substitute budget. Many will recall that I offered a substitute budget last year that basically did the same thing. It froze the national defense function at the current year, and froze the discretionary programs at the current year.

It was really designed to be an effort that I thought both sides of the aisle could support because Republicans always have been known to be such strong supporters of national defense, so I said it is time for us to give something up, some of our priorities and let us freeze defense for a year; and it also spoke to Democrats who tend to be very concerned about the other side of the budget, and I said to them in the discretionary function, look, the simple fact of the matter is let us freeze it also and we can make great gains. I did not touch the entitlement programs, nor did I touch the cost-of-living increases, because I think those are programs that both parties and all people in this House are deeply concerned about and something that we feel ought to be provided.

Last year's budget, had it been adopted, the Kasich substitute, would have put us in a position this year of where we would have met the Gramm-Rudman targets without having to do really any heavy lifting whatsoever this year. I was defeated last year and knew that I would be for the simple reason that Republicans voted no because they were supporting the administration, and Democrats voted no because they were supporting their own, and so I was defeated.

So this year I thought okay, do I want to go through this again and come to the floor and not get the votes that I want, and I decided in my heart that I should, because as I have watched the budget process, being a member of the Budget Committee, I have such a tremendous sense of frustration that we are fiddling as Rome burns. That is not meant to cast aspersions on our leadership, because I want to tell Members that I think LEON PANETTA is one of the greatest Members of this House. LEON is a phenomenal guy, and he is trying to make a difference. BILL FRENZEL, when he retires, as far as I am concerned, it will be the greatest loss to this House since I have been a Member of the House, because he encourages young people, and at the same time he encourages innovative ideas. It is not their fault. It is the fault of rotten, lousy politics that occur in this city.

So what I decided was I was going to send my own personal message that I wanted to disavow the partisan politics, the gamesmanship, the planning and plotting, and I would make an honest, intellectual effort to provide my own budget.

I hear a lot of Members say I am not going to vote for the President's budget, I am not going to vote for the Democrats budget, I am voting for nothing. My approach is what is it that I stand for, so I made an effort again this year to put forward my own budget that I felt was going to be a responsible one, that should receive support on both sides of the aisle.

What I did was I called the staff, the Budget Committee staff and my own personal staff and I said let us take a look at what we did last year. Let us freeze defense at this current year. That is not that much of a dramatic change from what our own President wants, and remember, his budget went in 1 year ago. And I do not think it is out of line for a Republican Party that believes in a strong defense to say that in light of the changing world conditions that we ought to freeze the defense function for 1 year. I think that is more than reasonable, and that is what I offer.

I also looked at the discretionary programs and said that for 1 year we ought to freeze the discretionary programs. I recognize that within that freeze we have a pot of money that is labeled discretionary. If the Appropriations Committee believes that there are some priorities in discretionary spending that are better than others; for example, education, they can find the money. There is nothing that prevents them from shifting that money around, but the overall pot of discretionary spending, in my judgment, should be frozen for 1 year.

This is what is so unbelievable. With the minimal amount of restraint, because remember, I do not affect COLA's, I do not affect entitlement programs, I only freeze defense, and I only freeze discretionary programs, this year I meet the Gramm-Rudman targets, next year I meet the Gramm-Rudman targets, and this is what is totally unbelievable, in the third year, 1993, my budget provides a $5.7 billion surplus, a $5.7 billion surplus.

So what is the message today? The message today is that if we just make a tiny little bit of effort, that tiny little bit of restraint can produce very big dividends in the outyears when it comes to being able to manage our deficits.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUCKABY] made a very important statement here. He talked about foreign ownership of America. I believe we have to have a new declaration of financial independence. When we have foreign governments, for example, the Japanese owning $400 billion in United States securities, and we do not have the ability to maneuver our own way, that we have to keep our interest rates high enough to attract foreign investments because we cannot pay our own bills, that is a national security issue. I mean not only defense is national security, so is our fiscal solvency, and so what my budget attempts to do is to make an honest effort to get us in a position where we can ultimately balance this budget and start to chip away at that national debt, so that we can convene another constitutional convention to re-sign not just the Declaration of Independence in terms of thinking, the thought of the Declaration of Independence, but our financial declaration of independence which we are slowly losing, and I want to preserve our financial independence.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KASICH. I am glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio for yielding and want to commend him for his efforts. We agree on a lot of the issues facing us.

I would like to ask the gentleman, in your proposal how much do you reduce defense from the baseline?

Mr. KASICH. It would be down $9 billion.

□ 1210

Mr. HUCKABY. If the gentleman will continue to yield, how much does the gentleman reduce domestic spending that is nondefense?

Mr. KASICH. 5.2.

Mr. HUCKABY. How much does the gentleman increase taxes?

Mr. KASICH. We are back to the debate about what taxes are, but let me say in terms of the nondeductibles, revenue enhancements as we like to call them as we wink at one another, is $13.2 billion, a little less than the President's proposal.

Mr. HUCKABY. Would the gentleman repeat the number?

Mr. KASICH. 13.2.

Mr. HUCKABY. 13.2, and the President was 13.9; if I add those numbers up I do not get to the $36 billion gap.

Mr. KASICH. Let me run through the whole list. The defense freeze provides 9.1; the discretionary, 5.2; we add $2 billion more than the President in Medicare, but that saves $3 billion in terms of our proposal; interest savings are 0.6; user fees and collections are 5.6; revenue enhancements are 13.2, for a total of 63.6. That is where our deficit will end up in enacting all of this.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, let me just say that there are going to be those on the Republican side of the aisle who are going to be worried that if they vote for me they somehow are hurting the President. I want to make it clear that I do not think it is inconsistent to give the President a vote so the President feels as though he has support, but I think it also makes sense to be able to support a budget that reflects a little bit more the times that we live in today. Remember, the President's budget went in a year ago. This was put together within the last 60 days, and I do not think it is inconsistent for Members as a House on a bipartisan basis to send a message not just to ourselves but to the other body, to send a message that it is possible to work some pretty unbelievable things by just showing a little bit of guts and a little bit of discipline.

So this budget is not just aimed at getting Republican support. I would like a lot of my colleagues on the Democrat side who I have worked closely with over the years on defense and defense reform, and some of the Democrats who supported my budget the last time. I am saying, "Look, let us send him a message, let us send a message and say that the American people deserve more than partisan bickering, more than stonewalling, more than political barriers to our efforts to try to do something for the American people, the American taxpayer and generations who are not yet here."

I ask Members to give this your deepest consideration and try to support the Kasich substitute. I think politically it makes sense, and I think it is also the right thing to do in this whole budget process.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, pursuant to the agreement that we discussed last evening, I yield 50 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS], who consumed 10 minutes of his time last night. I yield the 50 minutes for the purpose of discussion on the Black Caucus budget, and I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be entitled to yield time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. MCNULTY). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume, and thank the distinguished gentleman for yielding time to me.

First, let me say, Mr. Chairman, that I would like to join with my distinguished colleague, the previous speaker in the well on the other side of the aisle, in complimenting the gentleman's integrity, his diligence, and his political and intellectual acumen so that it is a bipartisan embrace that we give. Second, Mr. Chairman, I would like to applaud my distinguished colleague on the other side of the aisle for his efforts today. Whether we agree or not, I admire my colleague's courage. I admire the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH] courage, I admire his dignity, and beyond that I admire his integrity.

Mr. Chairman, what we are about here today and what we will be about next week is perhaps the most significant business of this Congress. That is the writing of our national budget. I said last night the reason I believe this is such a significant effort is that someone once said that the only role of politices in our lives is to determine who gets what, when, where, and why. Our national budget stated a different way is a statement of our priorities, what a nation's national priorities are in terms of a statement of its national values. Therefore, what we are about here is significant.

Mr. Chairman, the world has changed and continues to change on a daily basis. The world changes in bold and exciting and creative ways that was not even considered or conceivable just 6 months ago. In view of the fact that the world is changing, Mr. Chairman, we then must change as well. Therefore, we must engage in the process of establishing a new national consensus that is in turn reflected in our budget. Therefore, it makes sense that several different approaches to the national budget come to this floor. The President has one approach to this budget, the distinguished members of the Committee on the Budget had a different approach, the gentleman from Ohio has an approach, the gentleman from California with a new approach, and this gentleman in my capacity as chairman of the 24 Members of the House who make up the membership of the Congressional Black Caucus, we, too, with great pride, enter this debate in the hopes of establishing a national consensus. We, too, lay before this body and in turn to the American people another approach to our national budget.

Our budget creates a new vision for America, and we do it in three ways. One, we expand those existing social programs that make sense, that have been useful to the American people, whether they serve rural, suburban, or urban Americans; second, Mr. Chairman, we establish a new direction for our national defense and our national security, not rooted in the obsolete ideas of the cold war but rather rooted in the realities of an emerging new world; and third, we develop deficit reduction politics by responsibly assuming our fiduciary responsibilities to zealously guard the taxpayers dollars. We bring down the budget deficit and we try to bring some equity for our tax system.

As in years past, the budget presented by the Congressional Black Caucus does, indeed, meet and exceed our statutory responsibility under the Gramm-Rudman Act. Fiscal year 1991 requires that any budget come at minimum to $64 billion. The Congressional Black Caucus' budget comes to $63.7 billion in budget deficit for fiscal 1991. As we project into the outyears in fiscal 1992, our budget again meets the Gramm-Rudman statutory responsibilities, and as my distinguished colleague from Ohio, the Congressional Black Caucus' budget in fiscal 1993 gives America 3 years out, fiscal 1993, $5 billion surplus. So we meet our responsibilities, we show America that indeed we met obligations with respect to deficit reduction.

Second, Mr. Chairman, we needed a revenue package as everyone does, but we did not do it with smoke and mirrors. We did it by deriving honest dollars. How did we do it? First, with respect to general revenues, we came up with $19.8 billion in general revenues. How did we do it? No. 1, President Bush has stated and has been quoted on numerous occasions, "Watch my lips, no new taxes." But I find it fascinating that in his 1991 budget there is an interesting euphemism referred to as "new revenue options" to the tune of $13.9 billion. The Congressional Black Caucus looked very specifically at the list of new revenue options totaling $13.9 billion. We rejected $5.7 billion of it, including capital gains. So out of the $13.9 billion we accepted $8.2 billion. So we began with $8.2 billion. We then looked at our tax system. We said there are wealthy people in this country who pay at the marginal tax rate of 28 percent while many Members in these Chambers pay at the marginal tax rate of 33 percent and above. So we said, "Why should some people be able to pay at 28 percent margin of tax?" We took them back up to 33 percent.

That gave us an additional $4.1 billion.

We then looked at the American corporate community that had been benefited by tremendous tax benefits during the Reagan era and the period of the 1980's, and we said, "Let's simply take the top 10 percent of the corporate earners in this country, just the top 10 percent, and levy a 10-percent surtax on the top 10 percent"—not individual taxpayers, corporate taxpayers. That gave us $6.5 billion.

We then were able to pick up $1 billion under the provisions of the Humphrey-Hawkins act, which says that if you can demonstrate that you bring down the unemployment rate by at least one-tenth of 1 percent, you can credit your general revenues with a mimum of $1 billion.

So with the $8.2 billion that we accepted from Mr. Bush, $4.1 billion in closing the so-called bubble, $6.5 billion in a 10-percent surtax on the top 10 percent of corporate earners, and $10 billion from Humphrey-Hawkins, we came up with $19.8 billion in general revenues.

We then looked at the issue of whether or not we should cut programs that presently exist. In the area of program cuts, Mr. Chairman, we came up with an additional $25.3 billion.

How did we come to that? We looked at the military budget. We said that the world is changing. We recognize that we have been spending between $150 and $160 billion, just as one example, to maintain America's role in NATO. I think there would be no debate on the floor of this Congress if I were to assert that at minimum the Warsaw Pact as a military entity has been rendered impotent. At best, it does not exist as a military entity. If we are spending in excess of $160 billion per annum to maintain our role in NATO, can we not make some substantial cuts?

Do we need a B-2 bomber? Why do we have to live with this Noah's Ark syndrome, with two of everything. Two bombers, a B-1 and a B-2, two missiles, the MX and the Midgetman? Why do we need two of this and two of that?

We always plan the military budget on a worst case scenario. Yet when we look at the drug problem in this country, we have a worst case scanario; when we look at poverty in America, we have a worst case scenario; when we look at homelessness in America, there is a worst case scenario; when we look at hunger in America, we see a worst case scenario; when we look at the deteriorating infrastructure in this country, we have a worse case scenario. But we do not budget on a worse-case scenario on social programs. Only on the military budget.

We are presently expending at the level of $306 billion in outlays. The President this year is asking for $303 billion in outlays. We stepped forward and we said, "Look, you can live with $279.4 billion." I would say that $279.4 billion is an incredible military budget. We cut $23.7 billion net. We were able to go even deeper, but we said that America has to make a transition from a heavy reliance on militarism to prop up our National Government.

We said that we have to begin to move toward peace, so we placed nearly $3 billion in economic conversion in our budget. We were the only ones that did that. We placed nearly $3 billion in economic conversion. We said that if we are going to create havoc in a local community by virtue of closing plants and closing military bases, we have a national obligation to offset that economic dislocation with economic conversion.

I have never had an American person walk up to me and say, "I demand a job building the MX missile" or "I demand a job building the B-2 bomber." But people have said, "I demand the right to work," which means people want to work.

We do not have to work building bombs and building weapons systems with the ultimate role of destroying our lives. We just celebrated Earth Day the other day. One of the greatest threats to our environment is the proliferation of nuclear weapons and the modernization of our nuclear weapons. Yet we march down the road to build these weapons as if in some insane and ludicrous way we can unleash the incredible terror of nuclear bombs.

So, yes, we cut $23.7 billion from the military budget, and we know that we can live with that.

When this gentleman came to Congress 20 years ago, the military budget was $73 billion. In the last year of the Jimmy Carter administration the military budget had doubled to $143 billion. We are now looking at budgets in excess of $300 billion. In that short span of time, in less than 20 years, we have gone from $73 billion in excess of $300 billion.

We humbly stepped forward and said, "Look, given the incredible, wonderful, and bold changes in the world, the Berlin Wall came down not because of Trident submarines and B-2 bombers and cruise missiles; it came down because of the people and the power of ideas."

It had nothing to do with all these weapons. In fact, the changes have come in spite of all this madness.

Mr. Chairman, we then looked at the science and technology budget. We cut $1.4 billion from that because we said this is research related to war. We then cut $200 million in military credit sales. So with $23.7 billion, $1.4 billion, and $200 million, we came to $25.3 billion. With $25.3 billion in budget cuts and $19.8 billion in general revenues, the Congressional Black Caucus came up with $45.1 billion in real money.

That is not smoke and mirrors, not games, not chicanery, not tricks. That is $45 billion. As I said, we met our statutory responsibility and beat it with a budget deficit of $63.7 billion.

What did we do with the other money? We took $33.2 billion and we placed $33.2 billion more in non-military programs over and above the President's budget. Where did we allocate the money? For those Members who are interested in agriculture, we put $1.583 billion more in agriculture than the President's budget; in energy, we put $1 billion more in the budget; in commerce and housing credit, we put $1.7 billion more; in transportation, $1.2 billion; in education, training, employment, and social services, which are desperately needed, $4.2 billion; in health, $3.8 billion more than the President; in Medicare, $5.5 billion more; and in income security, including subsidized housing, $5.2 billion.

Is it not extraordinary, Mr. Chairman, that the whole concept of affordable housing in 1990 in America has become an oxymoron? Affordable housing is an apparent contradiction. There are millions of American people living on the streets of this country. Hundreds of thousands of people eat out of garbage cans every day. I do not know about other Members, but as a human being I am ashamed and embarrassed that we live in such an incredible nation where we can find money more rapidly to house the MX missile than we can to house the homeless in this country, that we can spend money to build smart nuclear bombs and we cannot spend money to educate a generation of young children to make them smart, intelligent, and capable of coping in a rapidly changing world.

We talk about the drug problem in this country. Yet our only approach is dealing with the criminal side of it. If 100 children marched down out of the gallery today and said, "Give me treatment," we could not tell them where to go because we do not treat them. We have lived in years of benign neglect. We have not dealt with these programs.

So, Mr. Chairman, to summarize, I am proud and pleased to present the Black Caucus budget to this body. We have tried to fashion a budget rooted in competence, framed in cogent ideas, framed in dignity and integrity, and cloaked in compassion. We said we can derive real dollars. If we have the courage to cut the military budget, it can be done.

It is not a jobs bill. If we want to pursue that course, we know that studies have shown that for every dollar spent on the nonmilitary side of the budget, we generate more employment. Everyone in this body knows that the military budget is going to be cut. The only debate is, how fast, at what rate, and by what policies. So let us come to grips with that.

This budget deals with the issue of economic conversion. On the question of taxes, we do not use euphemisms. We come directly and honestly and cleanly to the issue, but we do not tax the middle class American people, who are overtaxed and overburdened; we tax the wealthy.

Frankly, that ought to be in the finest tradition of the Democratic party. But in some kind of way we are the only people willing to stand up and tax the top 10 percent of the corporate owners of this country, to take the 28-percent marginal tax rate for wealthy people, and put them back in the box with everyone else. We are frightened to do that.

With compassion, we ought to be dealing with the issues of this country. This is not a black budget. This is a budget presented by the Congressional Black Caucus. We refer to it as a "quality of life budget." We understand that human pain and human misery are acutely felt in the black condition, but this is a multiracial society.

□ 1230

Mr. Chairman, pain cuts across all colors, black, brown, red, yellow, and white, in America. It cuts across age and class, and our budget tries to reflect that.

We have a different vision, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee of America, and we say "Let's begin to march off in the course of compassion and under the direction of peace." That is the hope for this country. That is the hope for America.

I would have hoped that this approach would have truly been the congressional and the Democratic Party's true alternative. We think, as members of the Black Caucus, that we are truly Democrats with a capital "D." Democrats, because we have embraced dignity and principle. We have been willing to go beyond being a party of echo. but to be a party of choice, and we said we are prepared to stand here in the free marketplace of ideas in the open public and say, "Here is an alternative. Let's discuss it on its merits, having nothing to do with who authored the bill."

My colleagues, challenge us on the integrity of it or the lack thereof. We are prepared to be met here in the well and debate openly and debate honestly. And let us emerge with a new consensus.

We come to this debate intellectually honest. We are prepared to take off our jackets and take off our labels in an emerging new world.

How do we develop this new consensus?

Mr. Chairman, I say to the members of the committee,

"I've done my best to lay before you in general debate what the parameters of the Congressional Black Caucus budget is all about. It is my hope that all of you will take a good look at it. You owe us that. We have functioned here as a long participant in this process. Whether you agree with us or not, at least dignify it by reading it, and, for those of you who want to give us a vote without reading it, we'll love you as well. But at least read it so, if you're going to reject it, reject it not in ignorance, not in prejudice, but based upon your honest assumption that you don't agree with the policy ideas."

Mr. Chairman, we are prepared to meet our colleagues here. There are some of the most competent and some of the brightest people in the country here in the Congress helping in fashioning this budget. I am supremely confident in its integrity, and in its compassion and in its competence. Challenge us openly, and let us see where we go.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], the vice chairman of the Committee on Appropriation.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, this budget weary traveler has one question as we embark on this year's budget voyage. Are we headed for yet another train wreck?

Remember what happened last year? There was that springtime pseudosummit, involving only the Budget Committee heads and the Budget Director.

They trotted us out at the White House, and we endorsed a smoke-and-mirrors budget. We passed the budget in the late spring, holding our noses, but the committees never bothered to enact the required budget savings. In the fall, the Budget Director backed away from the deal, and by November, we ended up with a sequester as the only way out of our impasse. Talk about being taken for a ride.

When the administration sent up the 1991 budget in February, I asked Dick Darman if the administration's budget was SOA—sequestered on arrival. After all, it called for nearly $8 billion in savings in Medicare, $14 billion in new revenues, and a legion of other things that probably couldn't clear Congress. Leading to impasse. Leading to sequester under that infamous butchershop legislation, Gramm-Rudman-Hollings.

The same question holds for the Panetta budget. I call it a prescription for sequester. First, there is nothing to remedy the procedural problems that sidetracked the budget last year: Nothing to make the committees, other than Appropriations, produce the budget savings called for by this budget resolution; nothing requiring them to act in a timely fashion; and nothing preventing those other committees from adding new spending provisions to reconciliation, the bill that's supposed to reduce the deficit.

You'd think if you got into a train wreck once, you would go out of your way to fix the tracks. Not in this budget resolution.

And as for content, this budget resolution has plenty of ideas about how to spend money and few about how to save it.

When it comes to the $14 billion in new revenues required from Ways and Means, all the report says is that Ways and Means doesn't have to propose anything until after a summit agreement has been reached. And then there's another $5 billion in new revenues that is unreconciled. No one has to produce them. They will appear out of thin air.

But when it comes to spending—ho, ho, page after page of meaningless detail.

Five million dollars for agricultural controls for illicit drug crops; $2 million for technology Extension Service centers; $7 million more for the foreign commercial service. Christmas is here.

I understand the argument. The President made his proposal. This is the House Democrats' counter proposal. Maybe there will be a Senate counter counter proposal. At this rate it will be Christmas before we get down to meaningful business.

There will have to be a summit, the sooner, the better. It needs to be a different summit than last year's. Here is what Charmin' Darman said about what he learned from last year:

> I think that we made a bit of a mistake procedurally when we had our early negotiation, and we did it mainly with the Budget Committees. I think we should have included the Appropriations Committees and the Ways and Means and Finance Committees in the process * * * this year, I would hope that we would pay more attention to the need to include these other important power centers in the process more or less from day one, and not just at the tail end.

I am glad someone is learning from their past mistakes.

I hope I have learned a thing or two, as well. We're on the same track that led to a train wreck last year. This is one train I am only too happy to miss.

Mr. Chairman, as my colleagues know, when Gramm-Rudman was on the floor of the House, I took that floor, I fought against Gramm-Rudman, and I lost. With the majority of Democrats and Republicans, they passed Gramm-Rudman. We ought to get rid of Gramm-Rudman, we ought to get rid of the budget resolution, we ought to get rid of the Committee on the Budget, and let us get back to the old system that we had here in the Congress. I am going to vote against every one of these today. I hope my colleagues will join me.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 seconds to my distinguished colleague, the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to rise to compliment the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS], the chairman of the Black Caucus, for a very humane, quality of life budget. It is an excellent budget. It always has been. I have supported it for the 13 years I have been in Congress, and the truth of it is, the fact is, that most of us do not look at it and scrutinize it, and I think, if the American people knew more about what is in this, they would say, "Good for you," because it involves quality education, and health care and all the anchor issues that our people really need, and I just simply wanted to say, "I'm going to support it, and I want to compliment the chairman and other members of the Black Caucus."

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS].

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin by congratulating the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS], the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, for producing what is probably the finest alternative budget that we have produced in the history of the Congressional Black Caucus. The stamp of his passion for reasonable approaches to expenditure to the taxpayers' dollar is very much on this budget.

The Congressional Black Caucus quality of life budget could be viewed as the budget of the future because more and more, as the years go by, we see elements of the Congressional Black Caucus budget being adopted in subsequent budgets produced by the Democratic Party, and I suspect that more than ever before elements and components of this particular budget will end up next year in the regular proposal by the Democratic Party.

Mr. Chairman, it is the only way to go. It is the obvious way to move, if we are expecting a change in the world order. If we are expecting tremendous decreases in the kind of money we have had to outlay for defense, then let us not hesitate. Let us go forward. Let us claim a peace dividend. Let us not let the money go down the drain for projects like the savings and loan association bailout and not allow it for productive enterprises such as the ones that are proposed in the Congressional Black Caucus budget.

□ 1240

I am particularly concerned about education. I am not the only person in Washington concerned about education. The President is certainly very concerned about education. We have a set of goals that have been put forward by the administration and the Governors which I wholeheartedly endorse. There are six goals. Some of those goals have been highlighted in the President's speech at the time of the State of the Union Address.

One, he called for America to be No. 1 in math and science by the year 2000.

Two, he called for all Americans to be literate by the year 2000, and on and on it goes. All children should be ready for schooling, have the proper parenting and be prepared to go to school by the year 2000, which means that we ought to provide education for parents. We ought to provide proper health care for young children, preschool children.

A number of things are proposed, yet at this point it is no more than words on paper. The danger is that it will remain no more than words on paper. We have had enough rhetoric. We have had enough jawboning. What the Congressional Black Caucus budget does is we go forward and we implement the programs, $4.2 billion more for education is requested in this budget than is requested by the President, $4.2 billion more.

Now, $4.2 billion is only a small amount of what is needed, but it is a beginning, which is unlike the beginning so far that the administration is willing to undertake.

The administration proposes a $500 million increase in funds for education for new initiatives, but at the same time the administration proposes cuts for other education programs, so it is standing still as far as the amount of money it is willing to budget for education. We are standing still while the rhetoric goes forward. In this budget, we go forward.

Two major things happened with that $4.2 billion. There are certain kinds of programs in education which all parents have agreed, Democrats and Republicans, educators from all parts of the country, have agreed that preschool education programs, particularly Head Start, is a good program. We all agree, so we are proposing that we fully fund Head Start. Every child who is eligible for Head Start should be able to participate in the Head Start Program.

There are other programs, like chapter 1 which everybody agrees has been beneficial. We are getting good results, so let us fully fund chapter 1, so that all the children eligible for chapter 1 will be able to participate. That is one-half of what we propose.

Then we propose to take some initiatives. The new initiatives are proposed here in education. For example, the best schools in America, the very best schools are inadequate. A lot of us are pleased with out schools, we are smug about it, but when we give tests and make assessments of students in 16 industrialized countries, our very best students in math and science, for example, score near the bottom. Out of 16 countries, we come in near the bottom, while Japan, Hong Kong, the United Kingdom and Canada, come in near the top, so our very best needs to be improved.

On the other hand, in our central cities the school infrastructure, the educational system infrastructure, we have poor buildings, and poorly lighted and crumbling, literally crumbling, we have inadequate systems for replacement of substitutes so classes are sometimes without teachers. We need to rebuild the total infrastructure in our inner cities.

We have those two thing that must happen, and in order for that to go forward, we are proposing the establishment of a brand new educational and research development program where the 50 poorest districts in America are used as research and development centers.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. FROST). The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OWENS of New York. So via a research and development effort which would seek to establish a pattern by which we have a delivery system so that the very best that we know, the most innovative kinds of approaches to solving certain problems, teaching science, teaching math, ending the dropout problem, all those things are made available to every school system in America on an ongoing continual basis, the same way we built the best agricultural system in the world. We are ahead of everybody in our ability to feed our people and to feed large parts of the world because early in the game we established land grant colleges with research centers and county agents to take what the land grant colleges had out to the people. We are proposing to establish learning grant institutions with district education agents to guarantee that every school system will have the very immediate, most immediate exposure to the very best methods of teaching and the very best use of new equipment and new methods.

We are proposing to study what they are doing in some other countries and make that available to our educational systems. Every system in America can be improved, but they need the help of the Federal Government. We are not hesitating. We are not equivocating. Let us spend the money for education right now. It is long overdue.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DICKINSON], the distinguished vice chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, today I sent out a "Dear Colleague" letter stating my unequivocal opposition to the proposed budget resolution. I hope that all my friends on both sides of the aisle will take the time to read and consider its arguments before voting on Tuesday; however, I know that a lot of routine mail often goes unread, and I would like to express to the Members here, both in the Chamber and watching in their offices, some of the reasons that I feel this is an unreasonable, unworkable, and unthinkable budget resolution.

If the budget resolution being debated today is any indication, the Budget Committee Democrats have no idea where they are taking the defense policy of this Nation.

As I have said many times before, if you do not know where you are going, then any road will get you there. The Budget Committee initially wanted to significantly reduce outlays. Then after a lot of debate they said, "Well, let's cut budget authority."

Well, either way, the proposals here are unworkable and would create great hardship in this country and massive unemployment.

The fact is that the Budget Committee members who have brought forth this resolution have not in any way tied it in any way to the threat this country faces. We have just gone through 2 days of hearings in our committee where we had the best intelligence estimates that this country could come up with, the DIA, the CIA, and all the intelligence agencies. While they are all in agreement that there is a declining threat, they are all equally of the opinion, and have stated before the Armed Services Committee, that as of now the Soviets have not dismantled their first strategic weapon. We are negotiating, but they still are able to process their manufacturing. They still are making more ships, more tanks, more aircraft, sophisticated in nature, than this country has to date, and they are not slackening.

So while we have hopes for the future, we are negotiating, the fact is that nothing has happened to decrease the threat, except the perception of threat and what the Soviets have said they are willing to do.

Let us stop for just a moment to assess where we are and how we got there. You know, we have a tendency to forget, but the cold war used to be very real. Between the Berlin airlift and confrontation with the Soviets when they were going to put nuclear missiles in Cuba, if it were not for the clear and present capability and the willingness of the United States to force the Soviets to stand down, we would have nuclear missiles in Cuba today.

The United States has had the capability through strength to produce the peace that we are enjoying today. If it had not been for a strong defense of this country, we would not today be negotiating START. We would not today be negotiating the CFE, Conventional Forces in Europe, where we are going to draw down equally with the Soviets. We would not have seen the tearing down of the Berlin Wall. We have brought about peace through strength.

The budget resolution today would do away with the strength this country has enjoyed. We all agree that we need to spend less for defense as things are now going, but I think it would be unconscionable and unthinkable to take the drastic Draconian cuts that the Democrats on the Budget Committee are proposing that this country take.

We should have an orderly draw down. It should be reasoned. It should be thought out, not something that would create massive unemployment, as well as forcing between 100,000 and 200,000 people precipitously out of our armed services, 60,000 civilian jobs, if this budget were enacted.

□ 1250

I think we are doing great in this country. I think the prospects for the future are very rosy. I am very hopeful.

We had a briefing in a meeting yesterday with Gen. Brent Scowcroft, head of the National Security Agency, where he was saying that we are expecting START to be signed this year. We are expecting the CFE to be signed this year.

But this has been a long road that we have traveled to get where we are today. We have only achieved this by being strong, having the capability. What we want to avoid is drastic cuts that would have a very serious effect on our economy, a very serious effect on our defense posture. We have to remember that.

We have to remember what we have done after every conflict in the past, whether it be World War I, World War II, the Korean conflict. We build up to a point, then when it is over we dismantle.

We have just finished the cold war. Let us not precipitously dismantle. Let us think what we are doing. I do not think this country is ready for what would result if we passed the Democrat budget.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, my good friend on the Committee on Armed Services with whom I have the pleasure of serving, I would ask him only: The President had troop-level cuts as well, did he not?

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. The Democratic budget proposes the same. The Congressional Black Caucus budget proposes the same. I think that is of great concern to everybody about the number of troop-level cuts.

I would only point out that at least the budget submitted by the Congressional Black Caucus provides some help for those people who would be out of employment in the military. Does the President's budget do that?

Mr. DICKINSON. There is a built-in mechanism now, I am told, to help cross-training, but let me say with these cuts, if Members like base closures, if they would like to do away with home-porting, if they want to see more base closures, if that is good, vote for this budget; otherwise, we will do it in an orderly progression and not throw the country into an economic turmoil that will inevitably follow the passage of this budget resolution.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FLAKE].

Mr. FLAKE. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to commend the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] and others of the Black Caucus who have come together to put together this quality-of-life budget which I think best expresses what ought to be the sense of this Congress in these times in which we live.

Although we call it the Congressional Black Caucus quality-of-life budget, in reality it is the quality-of-life budget for all American citizens. It is the budget that speaks to concerns of people in this land who find themselves at a point where, in spite of the changes that are taking place in Eastern Europe and around the world, find themselves left out.

What we tried to do with the Congressional Black Caucus budget is make it all-inclusive with an understanding that if we are going to be the model of democracy that other people and other nations emulate, then we have a responsibility to assure that the model that they develop their nations from is one that is worthy of emulation. In reality, how can we honestly say that our model of democracy is worthy when so many of our people occupy grates in our streets, so many of our people are living in abandoned cars, so many of our people are living without any place to go to take a shower, so many of our people do not have an address? Even if they seek a job, they have nowhere to have mail coming to them so that they might be informed that they have received it.

This ought not be a nation that allows itself to come to this point in history, a most important moment perhaps in all of our lives, as we enter this last decade of this century.

The reality is that, I think, we ought to take a good look at this budget, because I think it helps us to be able to move to that point where we do make a statement to the rest of the world that our citizens are important to us.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we can move to that point where we can get away from labeling everybody and everything. We in this Congress have a tendency to say that those people who are for defense are conservatives, those people who are about the needs of the people are the liberals, and while we go about labeling one another, Democrats, Republicans, there are people every day who suffer. They are just people. They are just human beings. They just expect us to be able to make decisions that have serious impact and consequences for positiveness in their lives. We are not doing that. It is time to put away the labels.

Mr. Chairman, it is time to deal with the reality that the only label many of our people wear is poor, the only label many of our people wear is homeless, the only label many of our people wear is welfare, the only label many of our people wear is abandoned.

We must do something in this country to give a demonstration for that for which our forefathers and foremothers gave their lives, that we might be a better nation. We must somehow create an environment where people do not have to look at other countries and wonder why their country cannot be as those are that are emerging. What do we say to the American citizens? What do we say to those who are at the bottom of the barrel? Do we say to them, "If you want consideration from this Congress, then you must either declare yourself to be another country, and then as you begin to emerge, we will be willing to invest in you"? Or do we say to them that, "You must declare yourself to be Communist, and when you declare yourself that you are now a democratic nation, then we are willing to make an investment in you?" Should we continue to make those investments abroad? Yes. We must make investments abroad. No one would disagree with that. Everyone would have to argue that if we are going to make investments abroad, we have some obligation to make some invsetments at home.

We cannot expect our people to continue to accept our sharing with other nations without sharing with the people who have helped to make this Nation so great. The people in this Nation have so much potential, potential that will never be realized unless we are willing to invest in them, invest in education, invest in housing, invest in those things which are necessary to rebuild this infrastructure.

Mr. Chairman, we can no longer continue to live with the thought of a permanent underclass. People are writing dissertations today in the great universities of this land asking the question: "What will we do with the underclass?"

We in this Congress have an obligation to answer that question. We have a moral obligation to speak to the concerns of those people, and we have the wherewithal to do it.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a Congressional Black Caucus budget. The poor come in all colors. The hungry come in all colors. Those who are digging from the garbage pails behind restaurants in New York City and other cities of this Nation come in all colors. These are people who just want a chance. These are people who just want an opportunity. These are people who would like to share in the American dream of homeownership. These are the people who would like to be able to move from that status where they come out of institutions and schools of education which do not allow them the opportunity to be competitive simply because they have not been given a proper education.

Mr. Chairman, we must make better investments. We must change our priorities. Our prioritities must be our people. Let us invest in them, and if we invest in them, we are investing in America, and America becomes stronger for it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPTON].

Mr. UPTON. Mr. Chairman, I apologize if my voice is a little hoarse, because I was at the Caps game last night. Thank goodness for overtime and thank goodness for Rod Langway.

Mr. Chairman, what is wrong with the Panetta budget? There are two big things that are wrong. It rushes to spend the so-called peace dividend instead of giving it back to the taxpayers, and it raises taxes.

Let us face it, we can probably reduce defense below the President's budget proposal, and I believe that the administration knows that.

But how in the world are we going to cut $33 billion?

This morning Secretary Cheney announced a number of cuts that come out to $2.5 billion, not $33 billion, $2.5 billion.

Let me just tell the Members what they are: reduce the number of B-2's from 132 to 75; reduce the number of C-17's from 210 to 120; the A-12 aircraft from 858 to 620; aircraft carriers from 14 to 12 over the next 2 years. That is a total saving of $2.4 billion, not $33 billion that the Panetta budget is calling for. What do we do to shut down the production lines when we look at $33 billion? How do we decide to employ and decide the futures of literally hundreds of thousands of troops we are going to have to send back home? Remember that we have cut defense every year for the last 5 years relative to inflation.

Yes, there are dramatic changes going on in the world that allow us to change our defense strategy. But who in this Chamber can say for certain that changes will not change again? We must remain ready for that also. But this budget slashes away at the defense budget with no thought given to national security.

□ 1300

Earlier this week I was back in my district, back in Michigan, and I asked, "Who here thinks that they are paying too little in taxes? Who here would like to pay more in taxes?"

They laughed. Well, this proposal calls for tax increases up to three times more than the Bush budget that was submitted earlier this year, and leaves it to the Committee on Ways and Means to figure out how in the heck they are going to do it.

If we can save money in defense or elsewhere, why aren't we giving it back to the taxpayers? These are the people to whom the peace dividend really belongs, not the coffers at the IRS.

In conclusion, let me say this: the theme of the proposals of the Committee on the Budget is let us spend the peace dividend. Let us raise taxes, too.

Well, let me tell you something: that is not what the American people want, at least in the 4th District of Michigan.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, though the distinguished previous speaker was in response to the budget presented by the Committee on the Budget and not the budget presented by the Congressional Black Caucus, at this point I feel constrained to at least respond to my colleague.

No. 1, I think that this debate, as I said earlier, is too important for us to engage in hyperbole. The world is changing and we must come here in a rational and cogent fashion to establish a new consensus. So words like slashing the budget with no thought of national security is at best hyperbole. Disrespectful of the motives of Members of Congress, there is not one single person in this chamber who is functioning without any regard to the national security of this nation. We should be able to respectfully disagree with respect to the policies that ought to guide our foreign policy and our national security without these kinds of statements being offered. It serves no useful purpose. It does not contribute to the national security.

I would like to respond to a second comment that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPTON] made. The gentleman said this so-called peace dividend indeed will be a reality, but it should be returned to the "taxpayers."

America, No. 1, is not made up simply of taxpayers. America is made up of citizens, millions of them not taxpayers, millions of them children. 13 million of them live in poverty. They have paid the price of military budgets going beyond $300 billion. Should they not benefit from the so-called peace dividend?

Some of them are the 10 million black Americans and the millions of Hispanic Americans and the millions of white Americans who live in poverty every single day. They are not taxpayers. They are citizens of this Nation. Should they not benefit from the peace dividend?

There are millions of Americans who sleep on the streets of this country, a shameful thing in the wealthiest nation in the world. They are not taxpayers, Mr. Chairman. Should they not benefit?

The point I make is very simple, that the people who should benefit from whatever peace dividend is derived from a changing world and our desire to move away from $300 billion military budget ought to be the people upon whose backs the $300 billion military budget was based in the first place.

We have poverty and homelessness and hopelessness because we decided to pursue a course challenging the evil empire, challenging communism. The Berlin Wall fell. Communist governments toppled without nuclear missiles being fired. So the world is changing and the military budgets do have to come down. I would submit that it is these people who ought to benefit.

Finally, my distinguished colleague from Texas raised a very interesting question with the distinguished gentleman from Alabama when he said does not the President's budget call for troop reductions? The answer is "Yes." Does not the Committee on the Budget's budget call for troop reductions? Yes. Does the Congressional Black Caucus' quality of life budget call for troop reductions? The answer is yes.

There are two points: We are the only budget that places $3 billion in economic conversion to offset the economic dislocation that would result. As far as I am concerned, that is a plus.

We take 200,000 troops. We have 2.1 million men and women under arms, Mr. Chairman. We have in excess of 300,000 American troops in Europe. Where is the threat? 200,000 troops is not a lot of troops.

But we do not go about that willy-nilly; $3 billion will offset at least 150,000 jobs.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I think that is a point that needs to be stressed and made here, because there is no other comparable provision in any of the other budgets. I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] and the Black Caucus in fact for making that provision. In any event, it ought to be a part of any budget that is taken seriously on the House floor today and any ultimately passed by this Congress.

Let me add one other thing. In support of the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] about the previous speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. UPTON] when he suggested he used hyperbole, I suggest that perhaps those who take shortcuts and try to oversimplify things also make a mistake.

The gentleman talked about the assembly line of production for military hardware. Let me point out what the President's budget does when we talk about an assembly line.

Assembly line, indeed. When we talk about the American people and what we need in this country, the President himself suggests cutting Medicare by $5.5 billion in fiscal year 1991. That includes a cut of $3.35 billion in Medicare payments to hospitals and $2.15 billion in Medicare payments to health providers.

Mr. Chairman, I think that it is time that a lot of us did stand up, and I am glad that the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] has stood up and raised issue with the kind of domestic spending cuts that this administration would make and send down here every year, and they wonder whether or not that budget is going to be dead on arrival. You bet it is going to be, when you begin to treat the American people with the callous disregard of assembly line production recommended in the President's budget.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, reclaiming my time, I continue to yield myself such time as I may consume just to make one final comment.

The distinguished gentleman from Alabama indicated that we have now come to the negotiating table with respect to starting conventional talks and we have gotten to this moment by peace through strength.

Let us for a moment not debate this question. Let us say that we have spent the Soviet Union into oblivion. I would simply suggest that we have spent ourselves into oblivion as well with tremendous deficit spending, Draconian cuts in social programs, with the human misery quotient across all the lines that divided us up high in 1990.

But beyond that I would suggest this: if we have indeed taken the Soviet Union to the negotiating table with a $300 billion military budget, why then is it necessary for us to engage in a nuclear modernization program, to modernize every single nuclear weapon that is on the drawing board of the Pentagon?

No. 1, if we just celebrated Earth Day, then why do we need to advance our nuclear capability, when all of us know if we exploded just 10 percent of the nuclear arsenal of the United States, we would destroy between 80 and 90 percent of the Earth's ozone layer, producing a level of megadeaths beyond our ability to comprehend?

Mr. Chairman, to pursue modernization and nuclear technology is like two men in a room, one with 10 matches, the other with 7 matches up to their necks in gasoline, arguing over whether they should have 12 matches, 14 matches, or 20 matches.

This is an absurdity. Everything has changed except the way we think. We do not need to go forward with modernization of our nuclear weapons. If the strategy was to spend the Soviets to the table, what I hear from the Soviet Union is we are at the table.

Let us go to the table and negotiate earnestly back from the brink of nuclear disaster. There is no room for nuclear war and nuclear weapons in our lives. Let us go to the table and negotiate back.

Why build B-2 bombers that you have to negotiate away after you spend 60 or $70 billion? Why do we need to go forward with the MX rail garrison and then go to the table and negotiate back? Can you get the money back?

Why go forward with the Midgetman and negotiate back? Can you get the money back? If you melt down the B-2 bomber, if you melt down the MX missile, if you melt down the Trident submarine, you get a handful of dollars in scrap metal. But what is the price that we paid? What is the price of tragic, distorted priorities that did not allow us to recapture a generation of our young people that if all of us in this room were being intellectually honest, we are about the business of losing?

The business of this body is to preserve the future. I am more committed to a world that I will not see than a world that I live in, and that is a world of these children. That is the world of the tomorrows. That is the world of the future. What our budget ought to be about is the future orientation.

So those Members that march into the well that suggest that cutting a handful of dollars from the military budget takes us to the brink of war are engaging in hyperbole.

□ 1310

Those who believe that in some way the Soviet Union is coming across the central path of Europe at a time when East Germany and West Germany are on the brink of marrying each other, are living in an absurd world. Let us debate honestly and intellectually honestly on the floor of this Congress. Any way we do it, we can make cuts in the military budget as we pursue a new future.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to compliment the Budget Committee for bringing us a budget only 2 weeks behind the statutory deadline. Unfortunately, that is the only complimentary thing I can say about this document.

While this budget seems to provide a substantial amount of money for a number of priority areas, it does little or nothing to cut the real deficit. Once again we are voting on a "this is the best we can do" budget. Once again, we are promising that next year we will have an honest-to-goodness cut-the-fat budget. On Capitol Hill, now is never the time for real action. When it comes to deficits, Mr. Chairman, this Congress has one answer: "Tomorrow, always tomorrow."

The American people know what we are doing. They have seen enough phony budgeting over the last 6 years to understand the games that we play. The budget process in the end is a game we play only to fool ourselves and no one else. The American people did not elect us to come here and vote for ongoing huge deficit spending. They elected us to come here and have the courage to make the difficult choices that will strengthen the foundations of our economy, not undermine them, choices that will make America a better place to live and work and to raise our children.

Mr. Chairman, let us face it, we are failing. We are failing as an institution, we are failing as individual legislators.

There are excellent Members here in the Congress, but collectively we are undermining the public trust and mortgaging our economic future.

Most of the debate we have heard revolves around the peace dividend. But the Budget Committee is reluctant to mention, while it trumpets about defense cuts, that nondefense discretionary spending is jacked up by $62 billion in this budget, 14 of the 16 discretionary functions have real increases. This budget earmarks every penny of the so-called peace dividend for new spending and nothing for deficit reduction.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman is incorrect in that statement.

Mr. PORTER. I will not yield because I do not have the time.

Mr. PANETTA. If the gentleman wants to continue with an incorrect statement, let him proceed.

Mr. PORTER. I would like to continue.

This budget has $19.4 billion of new taxes. If I thought these revenues would cut the deficit, Mr. Chairman, I would support them. But in this decade, increased taxes have never resulted in reduced deficits. They have been spent on new programs like the irresponsible child care bill we tripped over ourselves to pass earlier this year, and on existing programs. And the deficit has remained monumental.

Make no mistake, Mr. Chairman, we have not cut the deficit yet. Regardless of what the Gramm-Rudman numbers show, we are just hiding it behind the trust funds. This budget continues Congress' policy of prodeficit spending. It has it all, new taxes, new spending, new borrowing and no courage.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to oppose this flimflam budget of 1990. I respect my colleagues on the Budget Committee and the difficult job they have, but courage and leadership must start here, and the best start would be to defeat this budget.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me. I did want to correct the gentleman's remarks with regard to the deficit reduction from the defense budget. In the committee's budget one-half of that goes for deficit reduction, and yes, one-half of it goes to investments.

It seems to me that is the proper course we ought to be taking when we achieve the savings in the defense area. After all, if we are willing to cut defense to pay for foreign aid to Nicaragua and to Panama, why should we not be able to use some of that money with regard to human needs in our own society?

In addition to that, my Republican colleagues in letters that were sent to the Budget Committee, 143 Republicans asked me not to cut but to add money to a whole series of programs in the budget. So this is not just Democrats, it is Republicans as well. They have recognized there are needs within our own society, and the fact that we have a responsibility not only to reduce the deficit but to invest in our own society for the future.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I am going to resist the opportunity to take up that cudgel until a later time.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SMITH], a member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I am in a quandary. I do not know whether I am going to vote for the Bush budget. I do know for sure I am going to vote for the committee budget. I think that the committee budget falls far short in trying to do anything about the deficit.

I still think the most important problem this country has is the lack of a balanced budget. And we do not need to get there with new taxation.

This committee budget does in fact have a tax increase of some $20 billion in 1 year and $111 billion over 5 years. We do not need that to solve the problem.

I would just relate that I have a 15-year-old son who this last week had to file a tax return on his earnings as a bus boy. Last year he made around $2,500 and he paid 176 dollars' worth of taxation between State and Federal. I think there are many things that we are doing that are counterproductive to incentive and initiative that are required to make our system work. I know the gentleman from California earlier said that there were millions of children without enough money to eat and a lot of problems. There is no doubt about that. But we are not going to solve those problems with Federal dollars being taken away from working people and redistributed through the Federal bureaucracy and given back.

I think we would be better off to have the opportunity allowed by people who are working and who are wanting to provide those services themselves. So that is maybe a philosophical difference, but I think it is a very basic difference in what we are trying to do with our country.

We do have in this committee budget 18 billion dollars' worth of increased domestic spending, $15 billion in new entitlements. Where is the greatest growth in this budget? It is in the entitlement area, and we have worried about that for years and years, but we do nothing about it here but add to the problem.

The outlay cuts in defense I am not really as concerned about. I think we need a very, very good strategy on what this country is going to stand for, how we are going to protect the country, and how we get rid of a lot of the bureaucracy in the military, and get to the kind of equipment we need to have to defend my family and yours and the people that I represent.

In one area here I think what is going to happen is that we are going to get to a negotiation, so the only reason I would vote for the Bush budget is I think it is better than the committee budget in trying to move us to negotiations. The Budget Committee ought to be done away with. We ought to have basically two Representatives, two Senators, and the White House people to try and solve these problems. That is the way we end up always.

We should freeze the budget. I have been after that for a number of years. Had we done that in 1981, we would have had a balanced budget by 1983. We have the growth in our budget activity.

We could spend the dollars in defense more effectively. I think of some of the programs I have worked on, for instance, the AMRAM, there is $1.5 billion in the 1991 budget for the AMRAM. It does not work, the tests are not showing that, and yet it goes up to the DAB and gets a continuation.

There are two items in the Bush budget that I am not happy with that are regional concerns. One is the Bonneville Power marketing system that we have in the Northwest. Each year I have been here in the Congress in 10 years we get a proposal from OMB that we are going to sell this, we are going to change the mortgaging and the system set up in the mid-1930's. That is not fair to the Northwestern citizens I represent, and I do not personally like that.

There are two other items on which I submitted a minority report. One is that we fully fund the NOAA Coastal Water Quality Habitat and Fisheries Program of $1.6 billion. I think that is extremely important. The other is to provide a funding level to clean up the nuclear waste that is at Hanford, the defense materials. I think that is extremely important not only to the entire country but to the people in the Northwest part of the country.

So I have submitted additional views on the budget resolution, and I hope to have those included within the budget as it goes forward.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES].

□ 1320

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYES of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. Chairman, I am almost about to wind up 7 years as a part of this great House of Representatives. And in those 7 years I have not taken the floor to speak on any issues many times. I never thought that I would live to see the day when I would have an opportunity to address the issue of how we spend our money in this great Nation of ours.

Yet, I find myself in a position where I address you not with prepared notes but in the almost relaxed fashion as a member of the Congressional Black Caucus.

I want to comment, too, the chairman of our Congressional Black Caucus for the kind of leadership he has given in the structure of the quality-of-life budget.

I heard the gentleman who preceded me express some doubt as to whether or not he could support the President's budget and he also indicated that he was not sure as to whether or not he could support the committee's budget. He never mentioned whether or not he would be able to support the quality-of-life budget. I just want to suggest to us here as Members of this House that he ought to take seriously the budget that is being proposed by the Congressional Black Caucus.

It is not a black budget, it is a human budget, one that is designed to reach out to inhabitants of this great Nation who need some attention.

There are two main points that I want to make.

True democracy, if it is to work as we spread it around the world, has to include that neglected group in our own country here. We have people who are victims of poverty, which is on the rise, who are hungry. Thirty-seven million people in this country have no health insurance, and some die because they cannot afford or will not be treated, who need hospitalization.

It is high time that we make this one of our top priorities, health care.

I have had the opportunity, thanks to being a member of the Committee on Education and Labor, to visit other countries in this great world of ours, and we as one of the democracies in this world, other than South Africa, are the only ones who do not have some kind of health insurance to provide for the needy in this Nation.

We need that. And, yes, I want to mention to you the other point that racism should not in any way guide our decision as to how we spend the taxpayers' dollar in this country of ours.

What we ought to be guided by is what is best for this great Nation. One of the best defenses we can ever have is not to be found in our military might, but should be found in how we provide a way of life for our kids in this country, how we are going to educate them, how we are going to treat them.

Are we going to prepare them to become the leaders of tomorrow? We have got kids in my district, at least 13 out of 1,000 die because of infant mortality.

We ought to decide to do something about that, and I think the Congressional Black Caucus budget reaches out and makes this one of our top priorities.

I want to thank you for giving the opportunity to express my heart to you about what is best for this great Nation of ours, I thank you very much.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentlewoman form California [Ms. PELOSI].

Ms. PELOSI. Mr. Chairman, I thank our colleague from California, the Chair of the Congressional Black Caucus, for yielding, and I appreciate the opportunity to speak in support of the Congressional Black Caucus budget.

Mr. Chairman, the older I get the more I appreciate the remarks of the great Satchel Paige when he said, he was asked how old he was, he said, "How old would I be if I didn't know how old I was?"

It reminds me of the budget: What would our budget be this year if we did not know what it was last year? What would our budget be if it was a true reflection of our national values in this changing world and we did not base it on increments from last year?

Our budget would be the Congressional Black Caucus budget, a budget which measures our national strength, not in our military might, not in using our best brains for our most destructive means, but a budget that measures our national strength in the health and education of our children and our people.

So I rise in support of the budget and thank the Congressional Black Caucus for its very, very hard work on crafting an excellent document and urge my colleagues to vote for a budget that is not like anything before because it has new thinking and recognizes the new realities of the world.

The Congressional Black Caucus budget is truly a quality-of-life budget.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire as to the amount of time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. FROST). The gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] has 1½ minutes remaining.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remaining 1½ minutes in order to close.

First, to thank my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] for his generosity in dignifying the efforts of the Congressional Black Caucus in our quality-of-life budget by providing this gentleman 1 hour of general debate to place this budget before the body of the American people.

I would like to thank the gentlewoman from California [Ms. PELOSI] for her very kind and generous remarks and for her dignity and her integrity and diligence in this body.

I would like to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES] for his impassioned statements about the priorities of this country.

I would like to simply say in the few seconds remaining, Mr. Chairman, we have done our best. We have laid before you an option in a changing world, in the hopes that we can assist this body in fashioning a new consensus as America marches down the road toward the 21st century.

Our budget, as I said before, is rooted in competence, framed in compassion, and whose integrity, I believe, is complete.

We have tried to fashion a budget based upon expanding social programs that work, in creating new initiatives, developing a foreign military policy, a national security policy not rooted in the obsolete ideas of the cold war but in the emerging new reality.

Finally, we have based it upon our fiduciary responsibility to zealously guard the taxpayer dollars, we have tried to develop an approach to budgeting and the deficit that is responsible, and we have met our effort.

We have laid this matter before you. Please dignify the budget by at least reading it, and I think if you do, many of you will vote for it.

Thank you for your generosity.

□ 1330

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KILDEE], a member of the Committee on the Budget.

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this budget resolution and I urge all of my colleagues to vote for it.

I would like to thank Chairman PANETTA for his patience and hard work in putting this budget together.

This year, we have had a very open process in which our chairman has consulted widely with members of the Budget Committee and others to craft the budget we present here today.

He has had to deal with many competing demands in this year of great change.

There is a tremendous amount of unmet and underfunded needs in our Nation today and this budget goes a long way toward meeting those critical needs.

I have never been entirely happy with any budget resolution.

I doubt if any of us ever have been.

In this first year of the peace divident, I had hoped for a greater increase for education and Head Start.

It was my hope that the Rules Committee would make in order my amendment to improve those numbers by transferring less than $1 billion in budget authority and $200 million in outlays from the Pentagon's budget to function 500 for education and Head Start.

Unfortunately, that transfer amendment will not be made in order under the rule.

However, this resolution does provide a larger increase for education and Head Start than any previous budget resolution.

The House budget provides an increase over baseline for education of $2.5 billion in budget authority and $305 millon in outlays, and a $600 million budget authority increase for the Head Start Program.

For that reason, it merits our strong support.

I urge my colleagues to support this pro-children, pro-family and pro-America budget resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage Chairman PANETTA in a colloquy on the Commodity Supplemental Food Program.

Chairman PANETTA, in addition to the other crucial improvements for low-income nutrition programs such as food stamps, the House resolution provides a $150 million increase for the Women, Infant, and Child Nutrition Program [WIC].

It is my understanding that some portion of that amount for WIC could also be used to provide an increase over baseline for a sister program of WIC, the Commodity Supplemental Food Program, which serves children and pregnant women, as well as elderly Americans.

Mr. Chairman, is that correct?

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDEE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PANETTA. The gentleman from Michigan is correct in that we do try to cover WIC and provide guidance as well with regard to the Commodity Supplemental Food Program.

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the response of the gentleman from California, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE].

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the House Budget Committee resolution, and want to pay tribute to Chairman PANETTA whose leadership has helped to chart a critically needed new budgetary course for the Congress and for the country.

Around the world, this is a time of unprecedented changes. For America, these changes present us with an unusual opportunity to begin to address a number of new challenges that we face—challenges to our economy, to our society, and to our future. The committee resolution, in my view, is sensitive to these challenges and, if adopted by this Congress, will help generate among Americans a new sense of hope and possibility.

It is clear that our economy is in trouble—living standards are in decline—more and more Americans are living on the economic margin. This financial decline is especially true for young families. Between 1979 and 1987, the median income in real dollars of young families with family heads under age 25 dropped by 30 percent. The gap between rich and poor in America is widening dramatically, the middle class is being squeezed, and working families are facing an increasingly difficult struggle simply to make ends meet.

Huge Federal deficits continue to put a brake on economic growth, driving up the cost of capital, limiting capital investment and absorbing private savings. During the 1980's, Federal deficits consumed more than 66 percent of all the net private savings, compared with just 20 percent in the 1970's and only 3 percent in the 1960's. Today, incredibly, we pay $180 billion for just the interest on the national debt. This constitutes just under 17 percent of the total Federal budget!

We have become the largest debtor nation in the world, owing over $741 billion overseas, and the buying of America by foreign interests continues to accelerate. The British have, by far, the largest direct investment in the United States, exceeding $101 billion. Additionally, 7 percent of all American assets and 17 percent of all U.S. financial assets have come under the control of foreign interests. Should this trend continue, this latter figure will reach 25 percent by 1995.

What is worse, in a number of key economic sectors, from semiconductors to television sets, we continue to see America's position in international markets erode. Today, of the world's 100 largest corporations, no more than 35 are American-owned, 50 are Japanese-owned and 12 are owned by Europeans.

Our infrastructure of roads, bridges, and highways is crumbling. Just look at the condition of our federally built highways and bridges: 77,000 bridges—28 percent of the total—are either structurally deficient or functionally obsolete; 80,000 miles of pavement are classified as in poor condition, while another 300,000 miles are only in fair condition.

Our educational system is in disarray: American universities currently have 1,600 vacancies in engineering faculty positions; foreign students score on average 100 points higher than U.S. students on the graduate record examination for mathematics; four-fifths of elementary school math teachers are not fully qualified to teach math; two-thirds of elementary science teachers are not fully qualified to teach science. And 23 million Americans are functionally illiterate.

As for the environment, this past weekend's celebration of the 20th anniversary of Earth Day has brought into focus the major challenges we face there—challenges that require immediate action. The Environmental Protection Agency has told us that 110 million Americans breathe air that is unhealthy, and the American Lung Association estimates the national health care bill for air pollution-related illnesses is some $40 billion a year. In addition, over $70 billion is spent annually on the treatment and cleanup of hazardous waste—with two-thirds of that cost being borne by industry. And on top of all this there are the potentially catastrophic problems of ozone depletion and global climate change with which we must contend.

Then there are the increasingly urgent challenges we face with respect to housing and health care: over 3 million homeless people nationally, 90,000 of them in my home State of Michigan; 37 million working Americans currently without any health insurance whatsoever. And, disgracefully, 19 of 22 leading industrialized nations now have lower infant mortality rates than we have in the United States.

On top of all this, the continuing savings and loan bailout threatens to claim an increasingly large share of scarce budgetary resources: by some estimates the final accounting of the bailout could balloon to a cost of nearly $500 billion.

These, then, are some of the most urgent problems we face. They did not appear overnight, and we cannot simply wish them away. They are the cumulative product of many years of neglect and indifference and wishful thinking—and they will require many years of creative and determined effort to resolve.

But I firmly believe there is not one of these problems that is insoluble—not if we face them squarely and realistically. The time for blame throwing and finger pointing is past. The time for rebuilding is now.

We must act, simultaneously, on two fronts. First, we must solve the problem of the Federal deficit once and for all. Any hope of sustainable long-term economic growth for America will rest on our ability to get our economic house in order. The deficits represent a steady drain on our net savings, and the $180 billion annual interest we pay on our $3 trillion national debt is pure, unadulterated waste. Moreover, it is simply not right to ask our children and our children's children to pay for the profligacy of our own generation. So we must bring those deficits down.

Second, we must—at the same time—increase our investments in those areas equally critical to our economic future. In this connection, we need to understand that in the 1980's the share of America's gross national product devoted to investment in national economic growth dropped by 44 percent. And if we were to adopt the budget proposed by President Bush, we would only further reduce the resources allocated to such investment. Take, for example, transportation. The Bush budget would cut total budget authority by 10 percent this next year and by 22 percent by 1995. And by fiscal year 1995, education would be cut 15 percent below fiscal year 1990 levels. While the Bush budget proposes increases in a few educational programs, such as Headstart, these increases are effectively paid for with cuts in other educational areas, such as student financial aid. Under the administration's budget, over 200,000 students currently receiving financial assistance to attend college would no longer have access to this funding.

For the environment, the Bush budget likewise reflects a net reduction in budget authority and no real compensation for earlier cuts. By fiscal year 1995, it offers 33 percent less Federal funding for environmental programs than at the start of the 1980's.

So much for the bad news. The good news is that the extraordinary changes that are taking place in this world of ours gives us, now, an opportunity both to get our fiscal house in order and to reorder our national priorities in a way that will begin to seriously address the social and economic challenges we face—challenges that pose the most immediate threat to our long-term national security.

In my judgment, both the budget that has emerged from the House Budget Committee and the budget offered by the Congressional Black Caucus recognize this opportunity and offer a creative blueprint for America's future.

First, both budgets call for substantial deficit reduction. The Budget Committee resolution actually calls for far greater deficit reduction over 5 years than the administration's budget would require. Significantly, too, the Budget Committee produces a balanced budget over these 5 years without the use of the Social Security trust fund surpluses.

Second, both budgets call for prudent reductions in Pentagon expenditures, and the transfer of these savings both to deficit reduction and to increased investments in areas of pressing domestic need. The Congressional Black Caucus budget calls for deeper defense reductions and more rapid investment transfers—but both budgets point in the same direction and are guided by the same recognition of the changing nature of our national security threat.

The Budget Committee calls for a reduction of $11.5 billion in defense outlays below the current policy level, while the Congressional Black Caucus would reduce defense outlays in 1991 by some $27 billion. Both recommendations are in line with what some leading defense analysts are telling us can in fact be achieved, without any diminution whatsoever in our military security. I would cite, for example, the recent study by defense analyst William Kaufman, undertaken by the Brookings Institute. Kaufman, who has served the Pentagon under both Republican and Democratic administrations, argues that over the next 10 years it is realistic to contemplate almost a 50-percent reduction in defense outlays. That is, a steady, prudent recrafting of our defense force structure and budget should permit our annual defense outlays to be reduced from the current level of roughly $300 billion to some $160 billion by the year 2000—thereby freezing up enormous new resources to invest in the rebuilding of America. That is the opportunity we must seize. Both the Budget Committee and the Congressional Black Caucus would start us down this promising path. Even the more modest defense reductions proposed by the Budget Committee would, over 5 years, produce a 25-percent reduction in defense spending, pointing toward a possible reduction of 50 percent by the end of the decade if national security conditions warrant.

I also welcome the recommendations of both the Budget Committee and the Congressional Black Caucus to spread the resulting peace dividend both between deficit reduction and high priority domestic investments. The Budget Committee, for example, would commit 58 percent of the $251 billion defense savings realized during 1991-95 to deficit reduction, while 42 percent—some $106 billion—would be reallocated to domestic uses. The Black Caucus goes much further in addressing our urgent domestic needs, but it does this by assuming a much larger revenue figure than is achievable without the President's active support. In this sense, I believe the Budget Committee's recommended levels for domestic program increases are more realistic and far more likely to be achieved within the context of our equally urgent need to meet our deficit reduction targets. I say this with regret—because I believe that, in many respects, the Black Caucus budget is in fact more responsive to the urgency of the challenges we face and to the aspirations of most Americans for a sharper reordering of our national priorities. Nevertheless, both budgets do in fact point in a new direction and hold out the promise for a more hopeful American future.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the adoption of the Budget Committee resolution.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. OBERSTAR], a member of the Committee on the Budget, who has been very helpful in the markup on this resolution.

Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Chairman, the Berlin Wall is crumbling, the two Germanys are moving toward reunification, the Iron Curtain is melting as East European nations discard the mantle of communism and move into the bright light of freedom, free elections, and democracy; the Soviet Union itself is removing its troops from Afghanistan, pulling forces out of its former satellites on the western border and moving itself in a direction of more openness. It is clear that the cold war is winding down, democracy has won, and it is time for the United States to scale back our own overseas military presence and convert those resources into peacetime needs.

The Committee on the Budget did exactly that; it produced a "rebuild America" budget. It makes a real start on unraveling this massive military buildup of the last decade, and investing part of the resulting peace dividend into deficit reduction, and part of it into reinvestment in the human and physical capital needs that have gone unmet over the last 10 years.

In the course of our budget process I worked to develop my own "Main Street North" budget and circulated it among Democratic members of the committee. The committee's budget is largely along the lines of my own thinking; and in many cases, doing even better than I anticipated we could have done in reinvesting in human and physical capital needs. I compliment the chairman on the extraordinary work that he has undertaken in consulting with so many Members and so many groups in our own caucus, both in the Budget Committee and the Democratic caucus as a whole. This budget is a reinvest in America budget. It is one we can be proud to vote for. It accomplishes the goals of deficit reduction and rebuilding the strength of this Nation. It is one we ought to support.

Mr. Chairman, I would now like to take a moment to discuss the principal features of my own budget.

The events in Eastern Europe caught the world by surprise. Even the sunniest optimists could not have anticipated the swift succession of changes that swept across the Soviet Union's western front in the late months of 1989.

However, even as the first hammer began to chip away at that dreaded symbol of oppression, the Berlin Wall, Americans began to look at our bloated defense budget and anticipate the dividend that would emerge from it once the rationale for the cold war military buildup—the Soviet threat in Europe—diminished or disappeared.

The past decade of a $689.6 billion military buildup has also been a decade of domestic decline. Our Nation's roads, bridges, airports, waterways, sewage facilities, and rapid transit systems are badly in need of maintenance, repair, replacement, and, in some cases, expansion. Education, health care, housing, long-term care for the elderly, veterans benefits, nonmilitary research, child care, and other domestic needs have suffered from a decade of neglect as we prepared for a war that never came.

A FOUR-POINT PROGRAM

Now we have the opportunity to change our priorities, to reverse the flow of dollars from butter to guns. Earlier this year, during the five "Main Street North" public forums in Duluth, constituents lined up, one after the others, to present their views on Federal spending priorities. With very few exceptions, they pleaded for more Federal attention to human needs, and a retrenchment of the resources committed to the military, while also affirming the need to address deficit reductions. Drawing upon their heartfelt testimony; combining them with proposals currently under consideration in the House Budget Committee; and matching both against the demands of the Gramm-Rudman deficit reduction law, I have crafted my own "Main Street North" budget proposal. Based on the views presented at those forums, I offer a program that will realign the Nation's priorities by drawing down our unprecedented budget deficit and beginning to reinvest in our Nation's human and physical capital needs.

This program is based on four guiding principles:

First, cut defense spending at a reasonable rate. Meet the new, lower national security needs of the post cold war era, reduce forces at a measured, rational pace, balance weapons cuts and personnel cuts, eliminate some systems altogether and reduce others to real research.

Second, realize additional savings through specific cuts in nonessential nondefense spending.

Third, increase revenues through a modest combination of taxes and increased collections.

Fourth, satisfy the Gramm-Rudman requirements for deficit reduction while creating a small dividend for nondefense programs in the first year, and a much greater dividend in future years.

Using Congressional Budget Office estimates as a baseline, my budget proposal would meet Gramm-Rudman targets, eliminate the deficit and provide a $17 billion budget surplus by fiscal year 1995. Using projections from the Office of Management and Budget, which include more optimistic growth and revenue estimates, my plan would create a surplus of $302.8 billion in the course of 5 years. If either figure is accurate, or the actual surplus is found somewhere in between, this plan will soundly, reasonably, carefully channel our resources into deficit reduction, human and infrastructure needs, and possibly tax relief.

FIRST REDUCE DEFENSE SPENDING—$15.0 BILLION

Savings accrued from building down our national military posture is the lynchpin of the peace dividend. My program calls for the defense budget to be reduced $15.0 billion in actual spending and $30 billion in budget authority for future expenditures below the baseline—last year's budget figure adjusted for inflation—in the 1991 fiscal year. Furthermore, I propose additional, larger cuts in succeeding years. By this method, military spending will be cut a total of $82.4 billion in actual spending in fiscal year 1995.

The task of identifying specific defense programs for reduction or elimination is properly the responsibility of my colleagues on the Armed Services and Appropriations Committees. However, I do offer a number of suggestions:

Maintaining conventional forces for the defense of Europe consumes roughly half of our military resources. With the relaxation of the Soviet threat and the resurgence of Western Europe, the United States can and should reduce its presence there. Indeed, President Bush pledged in his State of the Union Address to bring home 125,000 of the 300,000 U.S.-troops stationed in Europe. I believe we can easily bring home two-thirds of our European forces, still maintain a strong presence on the continent with our NATO allies, and save $2.1 billion in budget outlays this year.

The B–2 Stealth bomber is the most expensive weapon ever built. Conservative estimates peg its cost at $500 million per plane. Others appraise it at twice that price. The B–2 is on the cutting edge of new technology. It is a breakthrough in aeronautical design and avionics. It is indeed a fascinating and exciting research and development project. However, its effectiveness as a penetrating bomber and its usefulness as a strategic weapon are questionable.

The B–2's selling point is its small radar image. However, once the bomber is found, it is defenseless. The plane carries no defensive weapons, only electronic countermeasures. It can easily be overtaken and outmaneuvered by standard fighter jets. It's payload is too small to carry an effective load of conventional bombs, so the plane is limited to nuclear applications, a mission that can be fulfilled more easily and cheaply by cruise missiles fired by B–1B and B–52H bombers from a "standoff" location. Limiting the B–2 program will save $1 billion this year and billions more in future costs.

Additional savings can be found by continuing to close down obsolete military installations, holding the strategic defense initiative [SDI] to research only, eliminating one aircraft carrier battle group and reducing two others, and terminating the Midgetman and rail-based MX strategic missile systems.

Since funding for weapons systems are spread out over several budget years, terminating or reducing these programs will produce additional billions of dollars in future savings.

Any cuts in the defense budget, however, should be made carefully and thoughtfully. They should be crafted with an overall defense strategy in mind, and in consultation with our allies. Also, major cuts cannot be made without personnel reductions. That means converting hundreds of thousands of soldiers into civilians, and moving a like number of civilian defense workers into nondefense jobs. It will also affect local economies as military bases and weapons plants are closed by the shrinking needs of the Pentagon.

These reductions themselves will create additional demand for Federal dollars to fund job training, facilities conversion, and economic development assistance. We must be sure that any final budget package contains money to meet these needs.

SECOND, REDUCE NONESSENTIAL NONDEFENSE EXPENDITURES—$2.6 BILLION

Even with ambitious reductions in military spending, we cannot meet the Gramm-Rudman target for this year without some reduction in nondefense areas.

The first nondefense item I would target is the Space Program. The NASA budget can be cut $1.2 billion by eliminating two expensive manned missions and research projects of dubious scientific or practical value, and concentrating our resources on unmanned missions.

Manned space exploration carries with it the romantic aura of courage and perseverance that brought the first European colonists to the Americas and settled the American West. The Space Program is important for scientific research and experimentation. However, I cannot support funding for manned missions because of the high costs involved.

In these days of tight, Federal budgets, there is vigorous competition for every dollar. Earthbound human needs—health care, housing, food, shelter, education, environmental protection—are our most pressing priorities. I feel we must forgo the luxury of manned space exploration at a time when these needs are going unmet.

Eliminating funding for space station Freedom will save $900 million in the first year. Eliminating plans for a manned Moon-Mars flight would save only $4 million this year, but would save $400 billion over the next 20 years.

Canceling work on the national areospace plane and eliminating two scientific research applications will net additional savings.

A great deal of scientific knowledge has been gathered by unmanned probes such as the Voyager and Pioneer spacecraft. These mechanical star travelers can rove through our solar system for many years, sending back pictures and scientific data from other worlds, at a fraction of the cost of a manned mission. These valuable programs should be continued.

Other nondefense discretionary spending can also be reduced by $1.4 billion by making technical adjustments. However, my program would protect entitlements and essential services from further cuts in the first year, and would provide a surplus in later years that could be available as additional funding for domestic needs.

THIRD, INCREASE REVENUES—$19.3 BILLION

In order to maintain essential nondefense programs at their current levels and still meet the Gramm-Rudman targets, my budget program includes a handful of revenue enhancements.

First: eliminate the "bubble" from the general income tax. This anomaly of the 1986 tax reform effort allows the tax rate to drop from 33 to 28 percent for incomes in the highest bracket. Keeping the high-end rate at 33 percent would net $4.2 billion in deficit reduction in the first year.

Second: a 1-year suspension of tax indexing would net an additional $5.2 billion. Indexing was a benefit to our Nation's economic health during the double-digit, runaway inflation days of the last decade. With inflation under control, indexing can be safely suspended for 1 year at little harm to the taxpayer.

Third: enact modest, specific increases in selected excise taxes, increase penalties for air pollution, and step up collections and enforcement of tax laws. These measures will produce some $9.7 billion of additional revenue.

FOURTH, MEET GRAMM-RUDMAN REQUIREMENTS FOR DEFICIT REDUCTION AND MAKE ADDITIONAL RESOURCES AVAILABLE FOR DOMESTIC NEEDS

The current year's Federal budget deficit stands at $100.5 billion. Gram-Rudman mandates a 1991 budget deficit of no more than $64 billion. My program would produce the $36.5 billion in deficit reduction needed to meet the Gramm-Rudman target.

My fiscal year 1991 budget plan would produce a modest $400 million bump in actual spending for child care, education, housing veterans benefits, and other underfunded domestic programs. It would also provide 3 billion in additional budget authority for allocations to these needs in future years.

This proposal would produce a total savings of $422.8 billion by fiscal year 1995. Of this total, $240 billion is realized from cuts in the defense budget. This is the true peace dividend.

My proposal would dedicate this dividend equally to the two most immediate and important needs: deficit reduction and domestic investment, yielding a total of $120 billion over the next 5 years for deficit reduction, and meeting the Gramm-Rudman target of a balanced budget in 1993.

A REASONED APPROACH

This proposal will not please everyone. It will not satisfy those who want drastic, immediate cuts in military spending; nor will it appeal to those who see a Soviet threat that still requires a growing defense budget. This proposal will do little in the near term to fund new initiatives; however, it will make a growing pool of resources available for initiatives in succeeding years. It will not reduce taxes, nor will it significantly raise them.

This proposal offers a reasonable, balanced approach to meeting the competing needs of defense, infrastructure, human resources, and deficit reduction without a significant tax increase. It uses a variety of methods to meet a wide range of needs. Most important, however, it eliminates the deficit and gives Congress some financial flexibility to address, in future budgets, the domestic needs that have gone begging during the decade of the 1980's. This budget will give us a clean ledger and a fresh start as we move into the next millenium.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, we have had a very interesting and quite a lengthy debate on the budget, on Humphrey-Hawkins, on budget alternatives, and I think it is appropriate now to think about putting them into perspective.

There are some common threads running through the discussions on both sides of the aisle. A few of them are these. First of all, this is only an exercise that we are performing in the House of Representatives. If this resolution is passed, it goes to an uncertain future in the other body, which looks like it has not achieved a consensus yet.

All Members admit that eventually the arrangement is going to have to be made in discussions between the President and Members of both parties in both Houses. In a sense, then, this is only the preliminary. The final bout will not come until we achieve summitry.

There are some other areas of agreement, and I think it is better to think in terms of agreement than to think in terms of all of the things that keep Members apart. One of these is that whatever kind of budget arrangement is made this year, it must be a multiyear agreement. One of the good features of the Panetta budget—and Members will notice I resisted the temptation to say one of the few good features—is that it mandates reconciliation on a multiyear basis.

I think that Republicans and Democrats would probably agree that when we come to a conclusion, it has to be one that takes us to a Gramm-Rudman deficit achievement by fiscal year 1993, and, at some time in the near future, to a balanced budget achievement without consideration of social security.

We have some other things on which we agree. We believe in certain priorities. But it seems to me quite obvious that the Democrat budget, which I find deficient, and the Republican budget, which Chairman PANETTA finds deficient, are similar in that they have been outrun by events.

The President's budget is one that was created nearly 6 months ago, created in a world that was quite different and in a country whose economic conditions were quite different. One could say that it has been overcome by political events around the world and by economic events in this country.

On the other hand, the Panetta budget suffers from the same problems as the President's budget, because it uses the economic assumptions of the President's budget in the first year, which is the prinicipal year in question.

So it, too, has been overrun, and even if it were to achieve, as it cannot because it has not reconciled all the savings, all of its savings, like the Bush budget, it would fall short by approximately $20 billion of meeting the sequestered target.

So I think we can say that if we say the Bush budget has been overcome by political events in the world and economic events in this country, we can say that the Panetta budget is equally obsolete because of economic events. In addition the Panetta budget has been overrun by history. It is rooted in a philosophy that has been obsolete since the middle of the Depression.

So obviously more is going to be expected of this House and of this Congress than it is willing to put forward in any of the alternatives. As a matter of fact, it has been said that the President's budget offered a cream puff, and that the Panetta budget sees the cream puff and raises it one Napoleon.

The only chef which has offered us any bullets on which to dine has been Chairman ROSTENKOWSKI, and while most of us have not been willing to accept his budget, I suspect many of us have muttered an aside from time to time that there is more truth than poetry in that budget. Certainly there is more suffering in what we are finally going to have to achieve than appears than either the Bush budget or the Panetta Democratic budget. Our future rations are going to be more bullets than cream puffs.

So I would say, let us not have any illusions that we are voting on truth and virtue here. We are voting on one tiny step which will move us toward the final compromise, the final compromise must be achieved or we will fall victim to what I think is an intolerable sequester of somewhere around $55 billion, give or take a couple of billion dollars.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I am going to thank Chairman PANETTA again for his many courtesies, for his thoughtfulness, and for his hard work, and I thank the other members of his committee, including both Republicans and Democrats.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman has one additional speaker, I would reserve my time until that speaker has concluded.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL], and I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WAXMAN].

Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the Budget Committee for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the fiscal year 1991 budget resolution as reported by the House Budget Committee.

I particularly want to commend Chairman PANETTA for his leadership. He has put together a health budget that rejects the Bush administration's assault on Medicare, puts more resources into the underfunded Medicaid program, makes funds available for the fight against AIDS, and provides increases for other high-priority, low-income health programs.

It is a health budget that I as a Democrat am proud to support. It is far superior to the Bush health budget, and far superior to sequestration. Chairman PANETTA, Mrs. BOXER, and their Democratic colleagues deserve a great deal of credit.

The committee budget rejects the Bush proposal to slash $5.5 billion from Medicare. It limits required Medicare cuts to $1.7 billion, the same amount which a sequester would produce. After the cutbacks and the payment reforms we have enacted in Medicare over the past several years, massive cuts can no longer be made without adversely affecting Medicare beneficiaries and, indeed, the viability of the delivery system itself. Even this $1.7 billion will be difficult to achieve. But it is far preferable to the Bush budget—and a far more responsible reduction target for the health care program that 33 million senior and disabled citizens depend on.

The committee budget rejects the Bush proposal to reduce Federal Medicaid payments to States by $675 million over the next 5 years. Instead, it commits much needed additional resources for improving the health of our poor citizens. It sets aside $285 million next year, and $7.55 billion over the next 5 years, for several critical Medicaid initiatives: reducing infant mortality by expanding Medicaid coverage next year for 38,000 pregnant women and 29,000 infants in near-poor families; improving the health of low-income children by extending Medicaid coverage to 76,000 children in families below poverty; authorizing coverage for community care services for 25,000 poor frail elderly as an alternative to nursing home placement; allowing coverage for community-based services for 22,000 individuals with mental retardation, epilepsy, or cerebral palsy to allow them to avoid institutional placement; improving access to hospice services to 40,000 terminally ill individuals; and providing coverage for preventive drugs to 80,000 low-income individuals with HIV infection who don't have full-blown AIDS but are at great risk of contracting pneumonia or other opportunistic infection.

The committee budget recognizes that the Bush budget does not put nearly enough into the fight against AIDS. The committee budget asumes an additional $700 million in discretionary funds for early intervention services and for emergency assistance to areas hard hit by the epidemic. The committee budget also makes a strong commitment to health research with respect to AIDS and other biomedical issues.

Finally, the committee budget provides for an additional $200 million for health programs targeted primarily to low-income mothers and children, including community and migrant health centers, the National Health Service Corps, and the childhood immunization program. There is no more cost-effective investment that the Federal Government can make than preventive services for mothers and children.

I urge my colleagues to vote for the committee budget.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, before I yield back my time, I yield myself 1 minute to say again how much I, as a member of the committee, appreciate the good work that the chairman has done and the hard work that all the members of the committee have done.

We do not delude ourselves into thinking we are anywhere near done with the total chore. In the large sense, our work is really just beginning. But, based on what we have done, not always in agreement but always agreeably and always cooperatively, I have high hopes that we will be able to achieve a compromise, and much of that hope is based on the good hard work, and the highly motivated work, of Chairman PANETTA.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume so that I may complete my time briefly before we proceed to the amendments.

I first of all want to begin by commending the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL]. One of my great regrets is that the gentleman has decided that it is time to leave the institution after a career in which he has made a tremendous contribution not only to his own district but to the Nation as well by always being forthright, by always being direct in terms of his beliefs, and I think he has set a standard as a Member of the Congress in the sense that he truly is someone who is committed to his beliefs, and votes that way.

For that reason, I have tremendous admiration for the gentleman, and I appreciate the cooperation he has provided. Obviously, in the absence of any summitry, we both recognize that we would have to walk different tracks, at least at this stage, but we have come to this point in a cooperative fashion and in a fashion in which we both know we ultimately will have to sit at the same table and try to resolve the differences that exist. But I do want the gentleman to know how deeply I will miss him in the future in terms of the cooperation that is needed if in fact we are going to address these issues.

We have had a very good debate. We have talked about the various elements that are all part of the budget. We all recognize that budgets are not just numbers, they are not just dollar signs, that they really are a statement of priorities and a direction for the country in terms of where we are and where we must go.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, as we proceed with this budget process, and it is essential that we do that, I think there are several things that we have to understand together, both sides of the aisle working together, hopefully, with the American people, in terms of recognizing the changes that have to take place.

There have been times during this debate when I have the sense that there are some Members who are operating in a time warp, and somehow they do not recognize the kind of changing world that does exist around us. It is truly a changing world—what is happening in Eastern Europe, what is happening with the Berlin Wall, what is happening within the Soviet Union. This is a world that is changing, like it or not, and I guess there are probably some Members that particularly do not like to have a changing world, but that is the reality.

In addition, it is not just something that is recognized by a few people. It is something that is recognized, indeed, by the defense experts themselves. The former Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, William Crowe, recognized that change. Former Defense Secretaries—Mr. Schlesinger, Mr. McNamara—recognized that change. The Director of the CIA, Mr. Webster, came up here, and he said that indeed it is a changing world and a changing military threat. Even Richard Perle, former Assistant Secretary of Defense, recognized that not only is the threat changing, but it gives us the opportunity to do away with some of the weapon systems that were built up to, in fact, meet that threat.

So, the threat is changing, and even to those who would suggest that perhaps Lithuania somehow changes the nature of that threat, let me assure them that Lithuania is just further indication of the deterioration that is going on within the Soviet Union itself. It is not an indication of further strength in the Soviet Union. It is an indication of deterioration within the Soviet Union.

So, the threat is changing. And I think all of us need to recognize that, as this world changes, we need to move from a cold war economy to a peacetime economy, and that is the basic thrust of the legislation, the resolution, that we have presented to the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, we need to make that transition; that is the reality, as we try to confront the legacy of debt, the legacy of unmet needs that we have seen during the eighties. That is not going to be easy to do. The President's budget, which will be presented to us, confronts it by basically saying, "Maybe we need to follow the same path. Maybe we need to just kind of move forward with the same policies." Indeed, on the defense budget, the outlays in the President's budget provide for $4.3 billion above the 1990 outlays, about $7 billion more than what was provided in the 1990 outlays, and he pays for it through cuts in Medicare, and cuts in education, and nutrition and retirees.

So, it is pretty much a reflection of the policies we have seen in the past, and, for those Members who think that that is the course we ought to follow, then indeed that is the budget to support.

However, if, in fact, there is a recognition that this world is changing and that we do need to provide leadership in guiding that change, then I think we need to begin to consider some of the basic elements provided in the committee resolution.

Mr. Chairman, it does need to be a 5-year budget. We can no longer deal with just yearly budgets and expect that we are going to provide a strategy, a plan for the future. Gramm-Rudman, as a tool, unfortunately creates the incentive just to make it pass a certain date at the end of the year, suggesting, "Don't worry about what you're doing with the deficit. Don't worry about what you're doing with the deficit. Don't worry about the outyears. Don't worry about fiscal strategy for the future. Just get by."

Now this is no longer a time when we can just get by, and for that reason we have presented a 5-year budget that requires 5-year reconciliation.

Second, we focus on the non-Social Security deficit. For those who have raised the concern about what happens with the Social Security surplus, the reality is that we have used that surplus to mask the real deficit in this country, and it is time that we focus on the non-Social Security deficit.

If we want to say to the American people, "Let's reduce that deficit," then let us focus on what the deficit really is, not the one that is created by Gramm-Rudman by including the capitalization on the Social Security surplus, but let us remove it, and that is what this budget does.

Let us also try to target a balanced budget—within 3 years under Gramm-Rudman, as we have provided, or within 5 years—but target for a balanced budget so that we restore the resources we need for the future because indeed our leadership is worth nothing in the future unless we have those resources.

And lastly, yes, it does require some investment within our own society. If we are going to reverse the trend of the 1980's in which we increased defense spending, cut nondefense spending dramatically; if we are going to reverse it, we have to begin to make the transition from reducing the defense budget to making the investments in our own society, and, very frankly, that is recognized on both sides of the aisle.

I recognize some of the arguments, that maybe there is too much here, but the President himself goes out and talks about a kinder, gentler America. He talks about the need for greater attention to education. He talks about the need for greater attention to transportation, greater attention to drug enforcement, and indeed those are all necessary priorities for this country.

However, Mr. Chairman, there is no commitment of resources, and that is what this budget does; it not only identifies the need, but it is willing to commit resources. And out of the defense budget, yes, we take one-half for deficit reduction out of those savings, but one-half goes to those investments. And why not?

When it comes to the supplemental, and we are talking about foreign aid for Nicaragua and Panama, where do we go? We go to the defense budget. We used some of the money to give to Nicaragua and Panama.

For goodness sake. If we do that, why not make some of the defense savings and put it into health care and housing within our own country?

So, those are the kinds of key elements that we are going to have to focus on, and that is the challenge that really the Committee on the Budget tries to present to the Congress.

Let us talk about these difficult issues and the changes that are taking place in the world and agree that from this point on we need to step in a new direction. We need to walk toward a different America, an America that truly faces the changes that are taking place in the world.

So, it is in that spirit that I hope that Members will look to our budget resolution and allow us to take that first step. It is the first step in a long process.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] is absolutely correct. This is just the beginning, but give us a chance to make that beginning, and support the committee resolution.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 310, concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1991. The budget resolution we consider today is a worthy attempt to get a handle on the Federal deficit while at the same time meeting the needs of this Nation in light of a rapidly changing world.

The Budget Committee product gives true meaning to what to date has been a rhetorical call for a kinder and gentler Nation. It is the first step we have seen in years toward joining the world in beating swords into plowshares and redirecting our priorities in order to meet the future as a prepared and vital people.

In the Civil Service and Postal Service arena, this budget resolution does many of the right things. It recognizes reform of the Federal pay system as an important priority and earmarks over $670 million more than the President's budget for Federal civilian employee salaries. It maintains equity among Social Security, Federal civilian, and military retirees in accommodating a full cost-of-living adjustment for all groups. It rejects the President's proposal for major cuts in Federal employee health benefits.

Make no mistake—this budget is not all sweetness and light. While the budget includes a number of initiatives for restoring competitiveness and responding to needs neglected for the past decade, it also makes tough choices in the allocation of limited resources, calling for cuts in Medicare and certain other entitlement programs.

I am concerned that the budget resolution includes instructions to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to achieve $1 billion in fiscal year 1991 savings. The committee has never shirked its duty to act responsibly in Congress' deficit reduction efforts and will respond to reconciliation instructions with policy initiatives which promote equity and make sense. The committee has made it abundantly clear, however, that we will not act to dilute the few benefits which Federal employees have left and we will not act to turn the U.S. Postal Service into a cash cow to alleviate the deficit problems suffered by the rest of Government.

Mr. Chairman, I support adoption of the budget resolution because I feel it embraces priorities which respond to the real needs of America. I urge my colleagues to join in this effort to face the Nation's future head-on.

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Chairman, today the House considers House Concurrent Resolution 310, the congressional budget resolution for fiscal year 1991. Though Congress drafts this budget blueprint annually, the budget resolution this year is most significant because it addressed the changing national priorities of our new decade.

This budget responds to the needs of American families, including health, education, nutrition, Head Start, and housing. It answers the call for action concerning U.S. competitiveness by increasing funding for our highway and aviation infrastructure, community development, science and research, and dislocated workers.

These vital domestic initiatives are supported through the peace dividend which is made possible by decreasing tensions between the superpowers. The peace dividend also must be devoted to deficit reduction if we are to maintain our standard of living and prepare for our children's future.

Concerning defense savings, the recent changes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe have made it possible for the United States to ease its reliance on heavy defense spending so common during the 1980's.

The House compromise on defense spending gradually but markedly reduces the Pentagon budget over the next 5 years. House Concurrent Resolution 310 would cut defense spending by $11.5 billion in 1991 to $295.5 billion. By 1995, defense outlays would be reduced to $266 billion, a 25-percent reduction from the spending baseline predicted by the Congressional Budget Office [CBO] for the 5-year period ending in 1995. It is my hope that even further defense savings will occur.

Specifically for families, the budget invests $2.5 billion for education. These include Pell grants, handicapped education, compensatory education, and dropout prevention programs. It provides a $3-billion increase in budget authority for new housing initiatives and expanded housing assistance, such as the much-needed McKinney homeless programs and $1.8 billion is earmarked for enforcement and prevention of crime and drug use. It also recommends full funding for the child care bill approved by the House and funds the Head Start Program to allow another 171,000 children to participate.

The budget plan also provides needed funds to help preserve our environment. It earmarks $611 million for the Environmental Protection Agency, the Superfund Program, which cleans up nuclear and toxic waste dumps, and for land acquisition to maintain and add to our national parks and forests. These funds would contribute to the goal of creating a cleaner and healthier environment for us to live in.

Enhancing U.S. competitiveness will be crucial in the 1990's. The budget resolution lays the groundwork for advancing U.S. research and development of new technologies, technical training for American workers, science and math education for high-technology literacy, and improved, less-congested highways for businesses to get their goods to market. The budget rebuilds our economic base and invests in America's future.

The other part of this plan addresses one of the primary concerns of my constituents in Wisconsin—the Federal budget deficit. The budget resolution meets the deficit reduction targets of the Gramm-Rudman law, reaching a zero deficit by 1993. In addition, the Social Security reserves are phased out of the budget by 1995. This will show clearly the annual budget surplus/deficit without smoke and mirrors. The budget would be balanced in 1995 without counting the Social Security trust funds.

This budget rejects the harsh cuts proposed by President Bush. It recommends a full 4.1 percent cost-of-living adjustment [COLA] for Social Security and Federal civilian and military retirees. The Bush budget recommends eliminating the 1991 COLA for Federal retirees and reducing COLA's for these retirees in the future. The budget resolution also includes a full 4.1 percent COLA for current Federal employees, compared to the 3.5 percent COLA in the President's plan.

The 1991 budget blueprint is a welcome shot-in-the-arm for the urgent needs and long-term investment in America that was neglected in the 1980's. Congress must take the lead to negotiate with the President to ensure that this blueprint for the 1990's becomes a reality. I urge my colleagues to join in support of the congressional budget resolution and work for its swift enactment.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in reluctant support of this budget resolution.

There are many reasons to vote against this resolution. It uses too many budget gimmicks to reach the Gramm-Rudman deficit target of $64 billion for fiscal year 1991. It is an unbalanced plan. It is not a bold approach. While the country has many critical and neglected needs, $90 billion of new initiatives is too much given our deficit problem. And while the revenue targets in this resolution are too high to be implemented by Democrats alone, they are too small for a bold deficit reduction plan.

On the other hand, I commend Chairman PANETTA for an excellent job of putting this resolution together. He has worked hard and consulted extensively to reach agreement with affected committees. I am particularly gratified that the Budget Committee reduced the huge and inappropriate reductions in the Medicare program advocated by the administration.

Mr. Chairman, I will vote for this budget only because it moves the process along. As my colleagues know, I recently proposed a much bolder deficit reduction plan with substantially greater revenue increases and entitlement reductions. I presented my plan as a challenge—a challenge to both the President and the bipartisan congressional leadership to enact a responsible fiscal policy that will enhance economic growth, reduce interest rates, reduce our dependence on foreign investors, restore our international competitiveness, and improve the living standard of our children. I remain fully and strongly committed to the deficit reduction plan that I presented last month, as well as to the budget process reforms that I have suggested to ensure that the budgetary savings and increased revenues are in fact dedicated to deficit reduction.

To implement the Budget Committee's resolution, the President will need to sign each appropriation bill and a reconciliation bill. I want to emphasize, however, that I will not convene the Committee on Ways and Means to develop a reconciliation bill without a preexistent bipartisan agreement that includes the President of the United States. I am particularly gratified that section 5 of this resolution contains specific language conditioning the reconciliation of revenues mandated in this resolution on just such an agreement. I am hopeful that negotiations leading to a bipartisan agreement on a substantial, multiyear deficit reduction plan can begin in the very near future. I am fully committed to that end.

Mr. Chairman, I am committed to work for a fair, balanced, and bold deficit reduction bill that will be signed by the President. It is imperative that we do so. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support this resolution as a necessary step in the negotiating process toward a substantial deficit reduction agreement so critically needed by our Nation.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, alcohol is the Nation's No. 1 drug problem, and received a minimal amount of the current drug war budget for both treatment and prevention.

Alcohol becomes an illegal drug problem when it is consumed by hundreds of thousands of minors; children and adolescents. Even so, none of the war on drugs money was allocated for the illegal use of alcohol by minors.

An estimated 17.7 million adults have symptoms of alcohol abuse and cost the United States $128.3 billion per year in health care, lost employment, and reduced productivity; there is no available estimate of what the combined problems of alcoholism among the homeless costs.

When the budget for NIAAA was incorporated into the ADMS block grant formula, this prevented any increases to alcoholism, per the formula process; moneys have not appreciably increased since 1981, and yet the problem of alcoholism has risen sharply.

Because alcohol is a legal drug, it has not been targeted for funding; and yet, alcoholism is our Nation's leading drug problem and its human costs far exceed those of illicit drugs.

Almost all cocaine and narcotics addicts are also addicted to alcohol, but we are only funding their illegal addiction.

Eight of nine teenage car accidents are alcohol related.

We cannot begin to win a war that disgracefully eliminates the serious and often deadly drug of alcohol. Alcoholism is a socially acceptable form of drug addiction to many people, and we participate in this form of rationalization because alcohol is a legal drug, it is an available drug, it is a deadly drug bearing few warnings.

But it is alcohol that was and remains America's No. 1 drug of choice.

Because it is legal, many do not consider it to be dangerous. Because it is legal, it is readily accessible to all members of our society including our youngsters—to whom it is an illegal drug—and our elderly, to whom it is often a deadly drug in combination with prescribed medicines.

Mr. Chairman, I am deeply disappointed that there is a targeted minimal increase in education and treatment in alcohol and yet another illegal drug program, enforcement, et cetera, are funded in the billions. Our priorities concerning the war on drugs should have alcohol as a preeminent concern of our policies.

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to discuss some specific provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 310, the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1991, namely, Federal pay, health benefits, and retirement.

The resolution recognizes that Federal pay reform is an important priority and includes over $670 million more than the President's budget for Federal civilian employee salaries. In fact, the report that accompanies this resolution states that:

The Budget Committee is aware of legislation pending in the Post Office and Civil Service Committee to reform the Federal pay system on a locality basis. In light of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee's intent to move such legislation to final passage, the Budget Committee will work to see that funding for such an important initative in fiscal year 1991 and in later years remains an important priority.

I am pleased that the Budget Committee recognizes that the Post Office and Civil Service Committee is serious about the need for Federal pay reform. The Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits has already conducted three hearings on H.R. 3979, Federal Employees Pay Comparability Act of 1990.

House Concurrent Resolution 310 rejects the President's proposal to tinker with the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program [FEHBP]. As our committee stated in its comments to the Budget Committee, "any changes in the health benefits program, absent total reform, are premature." The committee has conducted hearings on FEHBP reform and is continuing work on a legislative proposal to reform the program.

The budget resolution assumes a full cost-of-living adjustment [COLA] for Federal civilian retirees and rejects the President's call for a COLA freeze. Federal retirees deserve the same COLA as Social Security recipients and the Budget Committee has recognized that fact.

I am concerned, however, that the committee resolution requires the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service to achieve $1 billion in savings for fiscal year 1991. In the past, the committee has met the savings targets set out by the Budget Committee and will work to respond to this year's target. However, I must point out that Federal employees and retirees have sacrificed over $119 billion in cuts in pay and benefits since 1981. I believe that Federal employees and retirees have borne an unfair burden in the area of deficit reduction.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support a budget that is fair to Federal employees and retirees.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. FROST). Pursuant to House Resolution 382, the concurrent resolution is considered as having been read for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The text of House Concurrent Resolution 310 is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Under the rule, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH] will be recognized for 30 minutes and a Member opposed will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH].

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment in the nature of a substitute and would like to be granted the time in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman I yield myself such time as I may consume. I just want to say to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA], the chairman of the Committee on the Budget, that he would have shocked everybody if he would have just said he rose to support my amendment.

I want to again lay out for those who are listening, the Members and their staffs, what I intend to propose today, and what it really is, is it kind of takes a little out of what the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA], the chairman, just said, and I guess I would call this the kinder and gentler substitute budget proposal, and, as my colleagues know, it is kind of funny because it encompasses a lot of the elements that the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] just talked about, establishing priorities. But more important than all of that is to shoot down the road towards a balanced budget, which my proposal is able to do within a period of 3 years. As I mentioned earlier in the debate, I had a substitute proposal last year that froze defense and froze discretionary spending that would have put us at the Gramm-Rudman targets this year if it had been adopted. Unfortunately it was not, and it was not adopted, not because it was a bad proposal, but because of politics. In fact, it reminded me of last year, when I put this forward, of what John Kennedy used to say when he went to Columbus, OH. He used to say, "I get the loudest cheers and the fewest votes."

□ 1400

Well, whenever I come forward with this budget, I get a lot of slaps on the back and everybody tells me how wonderful it is, but you know, we got to the Rubicon and I put my toe in and now I am not so sure I can cross it.

Well, this year I hope it is going to be a little bit different, because if you took a look at what I did last year, you would see it was responsible and what

I am doing this year is I think equally as responsible and a very viable proposal. When I say a viable proposal, I mean that because it is not based on smoke and mirrors. It takes the economic assumptions that the administration budget rests upon, the same as the committee budget. We do not use the gold standard or any of those other notions that are fine in theory, but certainly not tested the way we would like in practice. It basically takes the budget and does two simple things.

One, it freezes defense at the current year. Now, the Bush administration, of course, does in fact cut defense. His budget went in 1 year ago before we had the massive changes that we have had throughout the world.

What my budget does is give us a hard freeze in defense, and I do not think that is an unrealistic step to take for those who are concerned about national security in light of the changes that have occurred within the last year.

The other thing that we do is we freeze discretionary spending at the current year.

Now, let me make it perfectly clear to everyone who is watching this debate that under my proposal people will get their full COLA's. I do not impact the COLA's of any of the people who have them coming in the next fiscal year. I also do not touch the entitlement programs. It was not my effort to do that.

Let me explain that when I freeze defense, a hard freeze in defense at this year's level, that to me meant that Republicans had to take a pretty good step and say that they were willing to say that defense had a share in deficit reduction. When I freeze discretionary spending, I am really saying to Democrats who are concerned about social spending that we need to freeze it for at least 1 year in order to achieve some significant deficit reduction.

In terms of the entitlement programs, I think everybody has those concerns right now and wants the entitlements to be delivered.

Let me tell you what is amazing. When I first asked my staff, Scott Salmon from the Budget Committee who did a fine job on defense spending which are even included in the Democrat budget proposal which provides a rational way in which we reduce defense spending and not have distorted reductions, but rather well-rounded reductions, and of course, Art Sauer, who is in his second year with the Budget Committee has worked on my proposal, and my own staff director, Greg Hampton on budget, I said to these guys, "Look, let's take a look at what we did last year and let us apply it to this year and see what we get."

I mean, it was to my surprise to realize that just a tiny little bit of restraint will go a long way in deficit reduction. I mean, I think that is the thing that is so amazing. That is the message that the Kasich substitute sends. It says that if we are willing to have a real freeze for 1 year in defense and in discretionary programs, we can have a balanced budget with a $5.3 billion surplus in 1993.

I think people who are sitting in their offices hearing this are shaking their heads and saying, "It can't be. How can this be so?"

But let me tell you, I took the budget proposal that I had, I offered it in committee, had Republican support in committee, took that budget proposal, it was sent down to OMB to be analyzed. I was projecting an $18 billion surplus in 1993. OMB's only criticism was, "You didn't figure food stamps the right way. The surplus will be $5.3 billion."

My revenue numbers are the same as the President's. My economic assumptions are the same.

Now, I want to tell you, there is not anybody in this House who politically cannot support a freeze of discretionary spending and a freeze of defense for 1 year and provide us a budget surplus in 1993.

Now, look, if you want to have more spending in the discretionary area, let me point this out. If the Appropriations Committee, for example, feels as though education ought to get increased, then they can take money out of the discretionary pot of some other program to establish their priorities. We are just saying that the amount of money in discretionary ought not to grow. We are not saying what the priorities ought to be. I mean, I think education is a big priority. So if we want to take something from one area and put it into another, we can do that.

But look, we all talk about reducing deficits. We all talk about the political problems in doing it. What I am saying is I am giving you a road map to send a clear message that we can do a better job in this Congress, that we can approach a balanced budget, that we can reduce our deficits, that we can show our concern for future taxpayers and future generations, and we can do it in such a way that I do not think you get any objection from anybody at home. In fact, the objection you ought to get is that if you vote against the Kasich substitute.

Now, for those Democrats who want to vote for the Panetta bill, fine. There is no inconsistency in voting for the Panetta bill and voting for the Kasich bill that says that we ought to have restraint.

And to Republicans who are worried about having to vote for the President, for me or against the President for me, it is not inconsistent to support the President and support my budget.

The President's budget, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] pointed out, is at least 10 months old or 1 year old. My proposal is a better reflection of where the world is today.

So what I want to say is that I want people who are following this debate not to think that this is some goofy proposal that was slapped together in the last minute, that is based on economic assumptions that are unrealistic or some other kind of fancy gimmicks in order to get us to a surplus, this is a solid, honest budget proposal that has been reviewed by staff, that has been reviewed by the OMB and by only freezing defense and freezing discretionary programs in 1993 we can have a $5 billion-plus budget surplus.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and ask for support.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment that is offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH], but I do that recognizing that the gentleman from Ohio is perhaps one of the most conscientious members of the Budget Committee, and that I truly believe he is committed to trying to reduce the deficit, trying to make tough choices and trying to make the decisions that have to be made if in fact we are going to restore the resources that we need for the future.

I truly believe that as he normally does, he has made a very serious effort here at the budget proposal that has been offered here. It is an honest effort and it is one that I would commend to Members to take seriously.

In part, I think it is done out of the frustration that I guess we all sense when it comes to trying to confront the deficit issue. There is a lot of talk about dealing with deficits, but it is very difficult to confront those choices, particularly when the politics of the institution do not permit you really to make the tough choices that need to be made, either Presidential politics or congressional politics.

But it is out of that frustration that the gentleman has presented the budget that is before us. I think the best way to define it is that what he essentially does when you use a freeze is that you implement what could be called the minisequester. The sequester is the tool that is used under Gramm-Rudman when all else fails. When all else fails, Gramm-Rudman basically says to cut everything across the board, take an equal amount out of defense, take an equal amount out of domestic spending and reach the targets that you have to reach. But in the process of developing a resolution and in the process of hoping that we can resolve our differences responsibly, it is my view that we ought to exhaust every possible effort to try to focus on priorities, try to focus on need, before we have to resort to the kind of across-the-board approach that is recommended in the gentleman's amendment.

The challenge for those involved in the deficit process, the challenge is to sort out priorities. As we move from the cold war economy to the peace time economy, you have got to begin to make careful decisions about how we reduce defense, where we reduce defense, where investments are made within our own society and what programs in that process can be reduced.

□ 1410

Those are the kinds of decisions that take time, take care, and I think need to be handled responsibly by both the President as well as the Congress.

The approach of the substitute basically is one that says regardless of merit, regardless of the programs that work, regardless of the programs that do not work, we are going to freeze everything. We are going to cut everything across the board, and unfortunately, that results in a lot of hits in areas that, very frankly, need attention. The gentleman's budget, for example, with regard to education would cut about $3.2 billion. With regard to subsidized housing, it would cut about $10 billion out. With regard to FAA safety and improvement, which is obviously an area of great concern at the present time, it would cut about $1.2 billion. The veterans' medical care would be cut $1 billion, as well as other areas that I think are of priority attention in trying to look at our society and what needs to be confronted from education to drug enforcement, from transportation to health care, from housing to veterans. These are areas, I think, that demand attention right now, and we ought to have the will and the foresight and the care and the commitment to try to do that in a responsible way.

As I said, maybe we will reach this point. Maybe if we fail, if we cannot come together, if we cannot resolve our differences, then, indeed, we may reach this point in the form of sequester. I hope that does not happen.

I believe the purpose of offering a budget resolution, of trying to proceed with the process, is in the hope that we still have a chance. We still have the opportunity to do the right thing. I am not prepared to surrender yet, and for that reason I would oppose the Kasich amendment.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, let me just very quickly respond to the gentleman's kinder and gentler criticisms by saying that in the area, for example, of veterans' medical care or education, as I said earlier, there is nothing that would prevent the Committee on Appropriations from making those priorities. The only difficulty that we have is that we are unable to take the first step, which is to agree that the discretionary funding ought to be held at a certain level. I happen to believe that we ought to freeze it at this year's level, and we can establish our priorities as we move through the process here, certainly paying attention to the critical areas like veterans' medical care and education.

I just maintain that out of that pot of discretionary programs we can prioritize. The gentleman would like us to prioritize right off the bat. I am saying the first priority has got to be to freeze the money so then we can prioritize, because if we do not freeze the money, we will never get to the process of prioritizing.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Ohio determined to sponsor his amendment, I was thrown into a state of confusion. The amendment which he is offering is very similar to those which I have offered in the past whose basis is a freeze. Sometimes we freeze everything; sometimes we freeze some spending, sometimes we freeze some spending partially. The Kasich amendment is a hard freeze, but, nevertheless, it has the old freeze philosophy, one which I have admired for some time.

On the other hand, I was nervous that the gentleman's amendment would be so cunningly constructed that it might divert Republicans from supporting the President's budget and, therefore, make it look like there was less support for the President's budget. I am now convinced that many Republicans like both budgets and that they can vote for them as being superior items to the Panetta budget to which both are offered as amendments.

I would suggest to the membership that when it considers the Kasich budget, it should not consider it as perfection, or as an item pending against nothing. It has to be considered in comparison to the Panetta budget to which it is infinitely superior, and I will, therefore, support it.

I will say one thing further, Mr. Chairman. There has been an argument: "Does Kasich cut something?" Yes, it does. If we are going to have a budget that is going to meet Gramm-Rudman targets and put our economy back where it belongs, and if we are ever going to get the deficit down to zero, we are regrettably going to have to cut something.

At some point, the Members of this House are not going to be able to stake their reputations on always adding to everything, including new initiatives. At some point in the game we are going to have to stop spending.

The Kasich budget just serves us a little sterner notice that that day is on the way. I urge an "aye" vote.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, let me just say a couple more things about this.

This is an election year, and Members are going to be going home this year, and people are going to be saying, "What are you doing about the deficit?" In fact, their opponents may be asking, "What are you doing about the deficit?"

What I maintain they can do, and they can hold their head up high and be proud to say that, "I supported a budget proposal that froze defense because of a world in which it can be accommodated. I voted for a budget that froze discretionary spending for just 1 single year, that I did not want to ask the senior citizens for their COLA sacrifice or for the very poor, their entitlements. I decided I needed to be compassionate enough to support them, but I did want to exercise some budget restraint, and as a result, I voted for this Republican's proposal because it, in 3 years, can provide us a budget surplus."

I do not think the proposal is perfect. I do not think it solves all the problems, but what it does is it sends a message and sets a tone that the Congress has got to change the way we have been doing things for the last 4 or 5 years, really for the last 40 years, when we get right down to it.

What I say to the Members is give it a chance, folks, and come to the floor and vote for this. Do not come up to me later and tell me, "It was a great budget," but you just could not do it. I mean, if Members are not going to do it, do not tell me it was a great budget.

The fact of the matter is if Members believe it is a good budget, take the chance, take the risk.

Members did not come to Congress for business as usual. I was in the back seat of a car on the way to the congressional basketball game the other night, and some of the guys were saying, "I am going to vote against this, I am going to vote against that budget, this budget. That is the politically smart thing to do." I looked at my friends and said, "What did you come to Congress for? Did you come to Congress to avoid hard choices and decisions, or did you come here to try to make a difference?" I think we are here to make a difference. That is why I am here. That is why the chairman is here. That is why the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL] is here.

I urge the Members to come to the House floor and cast a vote in favor of the Kasich budget, send them a message that we can be a better Congress, that we can do a better job, and we can provide budget surpluses and we can do a lot better by future generations by supporting this.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 2 of rule XXIII, the Chair announces that he will reduce to a minimum of 5 minutes the period of time within which a vote by electronic device, if ordered, will be taken on the pending question. Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] will be recognized for 30 minutes and a Member opposed will be recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the gentleman from California, Mr. DANNEMEYER's amendment, and ask that I be granted the time in opposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

I want to say just a few comments about what this budget resolution that I have the privilege to present to the House contains.

There is a hard freeze on defense in fiscal year 1991; that means the figures for 1991, and budget authority outlays are the same as they were for 1990. That is a little bit less than what the Bush administration asked for, but somewhat more than what the House Democrat budget presents. There is no change in entitlements. The growth that is anticipated as a result of an increase in the population will be provided for, including the COLA's for military, civilian, and retirees. The baseline growth for science and space and Justice as utilized, which results in increases. For instance, for administration of Justice, $2 billion over what we spent in this fiscal year, recognizing the additional burden the Department of Justice has in the drug war. The capital gains tax reduction for the first year is the estimate that is provided by the Congressional Budget Office, and the major component of this measure deals with recognizing that interest costs of the national debt in the next fiscal year would total some $270 billion.

This budget proposal would entail a major change in how we manage our monetary affairs. It would call for the issuance of gold-backed bonds. Last September, Mr. Wayne Angell, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, went to the Soviet Union and gave the Soviets advice that they should back the ruble with gold, and that the Soviet Government should issue gold-backed bonds. I had the privilege of meeting with Mr. Angell last fall and he advised me that he would hope that the U.S. Government would begin selling gold-backed bonds. These bonds could be sold in world markets for 2 percent per annum and that interest would be payable in gold. That is in contrast with the 8 percent, roughly, that we are currently paying to maintain our national debt. When we take six points off of the cost of servicing $3 trillion of the national debt, it will result, after about 5 years, in refinancing our national debt, with a reduction of annual interest expense of about $180 billion a year. That is not the whole deficit, but that is a good share of it. That is what this proposal entails.

We all know that we do not have the constituency to raise taxes. I do not want to raise them. I do not think there is a majority vote in the House to raise them. We are taxing ourselves at the rate of about 19 percent of GNP. The reality is we are spending too much, and the problem and the challenge that we have in Congress is how we develop a consensus for reducing the spending, and that is what this alternative presents.

I believe it is a reasonable way. It should not be a partisan issue. Paying less interest expense in maintaining our debt should be something that both sides of the aisle could support. I do not think many tears will be shed by sending less interest money to the bankers in New York City. It is the only means that this Member from California has been able to figure out how we can get out of this fiscal mess we are in. We are looking at increases in our national debt for the decade of the nineties in the neighborhood of $200 billion per year. That means if we do not change the course we are on, by the turn of the century the national debt will be close to $6 trillion. I do not know about other Members, but I do not choose to continue down this road because every day that we continue on the course we are now pursuing, that is, believing or acting that the debt bubble can grow in an indefinite amount, we are testing the point at which that debt bubble will explode in our face. I do not want to reach that time. This is a step we can take to avoid that.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will rise informally in order that the House may receive a message.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DURBIN) assumed the chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will receive a message.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Kalbaugh, one of his secretaries.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee will resume its sitting.

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET, FISCAL YEAR 1991

The Committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] has consumed 5 minutes.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take a moment to commend my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER], as I rise in support of his budget. I supported his budget in the past, and I rise in support of his budget today. The gentleman has done a service to this body and to this country over the past several years by bringing forth responsible budget resolutions that, if adopted, would go a long way toward not just reducing but eventually eliminating our national debt.

Mr. Chairman, I am reminded of a quote I read recently that goes like this: "God bless our children because they shall inherit the national debt." That national debt has just topped $3 trillion this month. That is a "3" with 12 zeros—1 trillion. Does any Member know what comes after trillion? If we take that figure and divide it by the approximately 250 million Americans, we will find that each American is in the red to the tune of about $12,000 each. That means that while we speak, every child born in America today is born $12,000 in debt. I do not know about other Members, but as one individual, I would like to think about leaving my children a home or leaving my children my assets, not my mortgage. We in this body are leaving our children our mortgage. That is selfish and it is wrong.

The debt is a topic that only gets discussion in this body. That is all it gets, lip service. When was the last time we had action? A vote on a balanced budget amendment? Or a line item veto? The point is, not since I have been here and not since a lot of other people have been here. Efforts to reduce spending are essentially treated with scorn in this place. We owe $12,000 each in this country, yet we cannot even get a vote on a balanced budget amendment or a line item veto. Not even a vote. I am not asking that it necessarily pass, we just want a vote. Of course, we want it to pass, but we ought to have a vote.

Mr. Chairman, there is a stalemate, obviously. The American people do not want higher taxes, and Congress does not have the guts to cut spending. So what can we do?

My colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] has a viable, sensible solution to this problem. The Dannemeyer budget makes reasonable cuts in defense and discretionary spending, and it includes full COLA's for social security recipients, military retirees, and veterans. It includes a capital gains tax reduction, which is what the President wants, and most importantly, the Dannemeyer budget addresses a problem that is ignored by all the other budgets that are being offered today and that we will be considering, and that is the problem of our national debt and the interest that we pay on that debt.

The Dannemeyer budget reduces interest, and reduces it dramatically. It does not hurt anybody. It does not cut anybody's program. Nobody should be opposed to cutting interest. It is very simple. When the Government borrows money, we pay interest. If Congress could get out of that, I am sure they would, but they cannot, like everybody else. Although they exempt themselves from other areas, in this case they cannot exempt themselves from interest, and so we pay about 8 percent.

According to the committee budget, interest payments for fiscal year 1991 will cost the Federal Government and the taxpayers of the United States $182 billion. That is more money than we spend on the environment, the drug war, and education combined, and as a matter of fact it ranks third behind national defense and Social Security. That is a huge amount of money, and as a matter of fact it ranks third behind national defense and Social Security. That is a huge amount of money, and it eats up 15 percent of our entire budget. Yet we cannot get a vote on a balanced budget amendment or a line-item veto.

This year $1.1 trillion of public debt will mature at an average rate of approximately 8 percent. The Government will pay off old debt and issue new debt. The Dannemeyer budget asks a very valid question. Why should we issue new debt at 8 percent when we could issue it at 2 percent? Can anybody give me an answer to that question? How much less is it? Two percent.

The Dannemeyer budget would issue gold-backed bonds at roughly 2 percent. This proposal alone, just this proposal, would lower our interest rates by approximately $35 billion in fiscal year 1991. Over a 5-year period, as more debt is retired at around 8 percent and more bonds are issued at approximately 2 percent, the Dannemeyer proposal would save the American taxpayers almost $550 billion—that is billion—in interest alone without cutting benefits and without raising taxes.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. ROHRABACHER].

Mr. ROHRABACHER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the budget offered by my friend from California Mr. DANNEMEYER.

The Democrat leadership of this House has tried to change its tune but they still dance to the beat of the tax and spend liberals. The 1991 Democrat budget calls for $62.3 billion in increased spending and $19.4 billion in tax increases in 1991 alone—a tax increase of $111 billion over the next 5 years.

Their Jimmy Carter-Michael Dukakis-type budget calls for more taxes, more spending and more borrowing. Congressman DANNEMEYER's budget offers us the opportunity to say "enough, we need fundamental reform!"

We need to look at new alternatives to the status quo. One such political reform is a return to a gold standard. Making America's money "good as gold" will lay the foundation for solid, irreversible economic progress for decades to come.

Inflation is the cause of so much of our economic, fiscal and budgetary problems. It eats away at the savings of elderly Americans. Inflation corrodes the income and assets of working people. Can we just wave a magic wand and have the evils of inflation go away? No, we cannot. What we can do, however, is recognize that a root cause of inflation is the instability of the dollar which has lacked legal definition since the early 1970's.

In 1971, an inflation rate of 4½ percent prompted President Nixon to impose wage and price controls. Today, inflation eats away at our savings at a 4- or 5-percent rate, and we call it a low inflation rate. The same can be said of interest rates, the prime rate and the unemployment rate. What was once regarded as a bust is now regarded as an economic recovery.

America is living on borrowed time. International debts, trade deficits, and budget deficits all cloud our financial future. A major goal of this Congress should be to ensure the economic vitality of the country, protect the life, prosperity and liberty of our people. One of the most useful things we could do to reach those goals is to support the Dannemeyer budget. At the least it is a protest against the budget madness we confront. At best it is a first step in restoring fiscal responsibility to this House.

Mr. Chairman, gold-backed bonds as a means of financing our debt and bringing down the level of deficit spending is an idea worth serious consideration, perhaps worth trying.

I support the Dannemeyer budget.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, one of the major problems facing the Nation today is, how do we pay our way out of the savings and loan debacle? As each month unfolds, we wonder when we will find out how much it is going to cost.

The reason I mentioned this and the relevance of the point I am discussing today of reforming our monetary system is that it is important for those of us who are policymakers here to recognize that when this Nation went down the road of separating the dollar from gold in 1968, consequences flowed from that decision, because when Congress responded to a request from President Lyndon Johnson to separate the link between the dollar and gold in 1968, this Nation changed the whole way we managed our fiscal and monetary affairs.

From the beginning of our history as a Republic, from 1789 until 1968, this Nation backed its currency with gold. One of the benefits of that interlude was that we had a relatively stable price structure. When we made the decision that we made in 1968, the inflation genie got out of that bottle, and we are living with the consequences today.

When we think about what happened to the savings and loan industry in this country, it is one example of how inflation, which Congress caused indirectly when we separated the link between the dollar and gold, has decimated an important industry in this country. And it happened, very simply, in this way: Up until the early 1980's, we said to the savings and loan industry in America, "Your mission in this Nation is to provide housing for the people of the country." And who could be against that? We said to the savers of our country, "Put your money in a savings and loan. We will pay you interest at 3 or 4 percent, and we will guarantee that those deposits will be insured by a depository of the U.S. Government to insure that the depositors are not going to lose their savings."

We said to the savings and loan industry, "Your mission is to violate a fundamental rule of banking: borrow short and lend long."

When we put our money into a savings and loan, if we looked closely at the passbook, we found that they had in most cases 90 days to return our money when we came in and asked for it. In most cases, when we walked in, they gave us the money right now. But read the fine print.

The savings and loan industry took the money that we deposited at 3 to 4 percent, and they loaned it out long-term at 5 and 6 percent for 30 years. When we let the inflation genie out of the bottle in 1968, we found, beginning in the early seventies, something happening in this country. Depositors began to realize that inflation was eating away at the value of their savings. As my colleague, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SMITH] mentioned, in 1971 President Richard Nixon imposed wage and price controls because the inflation rate in 1971 had reached the intolerable level of roughly 4 percent.

So, a depositor in 1971 was earning 3 to 4 percent on his money in a savings and loan, and inflation was taking that right away by depreciating the value of his savings.

So, what did the depositors do? They took their money out of the savings and loans beginning in the early 1970's, and they began to put them into money market accounts not insured by the Federal Government. Why? Because they got 8 and 9 percent return on their savings in money market accounts.

And where did the savings and loan executives get the money to repay the depositors that was being withdrawn from the savings and loans? I say to my colleagues, "You guessed it. They went to the money market accounts, and they borrowed it at 8 and 9 percent."

In addition, Mr. Chairman, I say to my colleagues, "If you are inclined with mathematical figures, if you've loaned money on a 30-year mortgage, fixed rate, at 6 percent, and you have to go into the credit market and borrow money to pay back depositors at 8 or 9, it doesn't take a genius to realize you're going to go broke."

Mr. Chairman, that is what Congress did to the savings and loan industry in this country as a result of separating the link between the dollar and gold in 1968.

Then, in the early 1980's, we figured out in a brilliant way, well, we have got to make up to the savings and loan industry, and so we modified what they could invest in. Theretofore they had been limited to housing, first trust deed mortgages, and we said, "We'll let you develop in commercial buildings, and land and investments so as to make up some of this loss that you have sustained," and that is when the hustlers in this country realized what a lead pipe cinch they had presented before their eyes because they went around this Nation buying up savings and loan with this increased authority.

My State of California is a sad example of how some people that had no conscience bought these savings and loans with the ability to expand investments beyond first trust deed mortgages. They invested in all kinds of wistful ventures, and, as a result, many of them went sour, and now we, the taxpayers of the country, are stuck with the bill.

Well, Mr. Chairman, I say, "You know my purpose in mentioning this is not to point fingers at anyone. There was nobody in this whole interlude that did this with a venal heart. It just happened, and there's enough blame to go around, and my point in mentioning it is that it's time to say that the experiment in America with a dollar backed by nothing is over. Twenty-two years should be long enough for any country to suffer under this illusion that we can manage our fiscal affairs in this manner."

Mr. Chairman, that is what this argument is all about in this budget resolution today because it will direct the Treasury of the United States to begin issuing gold-backed bonds for the purpose of refinancing the national debt of this country, and we will issue those bonds, we believe, according to the analysis of Wayne Angell, a member of the Federal Reserve Board, at roughly 2 percent a year in contrast to the current price that we have to pay to sell U.S. Treasury bonds at 8 percent, and that six points taken off the annual cost of maintaining our national debt will reduce the annual interest expense that we have to pay between $150 or $175 billion a year.

That is what this whole exercise is all about, and I would hope that my colleagues would see their way clear to support this budget resolution and the language it has in it which directs the Treasury to pursue in the manner that I have described.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, first of all let me indicate my respect to the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] for his perseverance, if not for the substance of the proposal. It is one that we have seen in the past, similar obviously to budget substitutes that he has offered in the past. The biggest part of this, obviously, would come from the refinancing of all maturing Treasury debt with 40-year bonds with about 1.5-percent interest annually with both the principal and interest redeemable in gold.

The problem that we have, Mr. Chairman, is that obviously, looking at our gold stock, which is about $100 billion worth of gold, under the plan of the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] the likelihood is that, if we pay interest in gold, that about 1.5 percent on the refunded debt each year, according to the schedule that he has presented in his budget, our gold stock would be gone by the end of 1996.

Obviously we might be able to pick up a little gold from the world's producers, but the world's producers happen to be the Soviet Union and South Africa, and I would hate to depend on the political stability of either of those two nations.

Mr. Chairman, I wish there were a simple answer to the deficit. There is not, and for that reason I would oppose the substitute.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HOLLOWAY].

Mr. HOLLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to get into the details and statistics, but I think we all guess sometimes what is going to happen. We try to use what we have to work with.

Basically what I have to say, we go in year by year, and every committee trying to find money to do what we have to do. It is time we make a broad step, and I know we are all afraid of change in this Chamber sometimes, but it is time that we look at an approach that will take us through the years.

When I see economists finally coming around to speaking about what the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMYER] has been saying for years and years, that we have to try to base our debt on a gold bond, I think we have to go forward in some different direction in this Chamber.

We keep growing in debt each year. I see statistics that even show that through the end of the decade we will still be going in debt with using Social Security as an accounting against our deficit that we truly have.

What I am here to argue and to say is that I support the substitute of the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] because I believe it does offer us a substitute. It does offer us a change for the future of this country. We get rid of the interest, and, if we can just cut down the amount of percentage of our budget, it has to go to interest, and, as I listen to people yell for social programs, yell for defense spending and all, if we just had that money to work with, we would not have problems.

But I stand here to support the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER]. I see it very much in the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KASICH]. We see a growing support for the approach he has each year.

I hope that the Members of this House will awaken and realize that we cannot continue to go down the road of deficit spending that we have been going. We have got to take a new approach, and in my opinion the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER] has a very, very innovative, new approach to it. I support this substitute and hope that all the Members of this Chamber will do so.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I noticed that my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA] made the observation that, if this country were to proceed in accordance with this budget resolution, it would run out of gold sometime in the mid-1990's. Let me tell my colleagues why I think that is an inaccurate statement. I think it is honestly made on the part of the gentleman from California, but why I think it is inaccurate is we believe today there is about 100,000 tons of gold in the world. About 40,000 tons of that gold is in the hands of governments around the world. We, the U.S. Government have 8,200 tons of it, and there are about 60,000 tons in private hands. The private holders of that 60,000 tons of gold have to pay a half to three-quarters of a point a year just to store it and to insure it. When the U.S. Government begins to issue a bond backed by gold, which says to the owner of that gold, bullion today, "We'll pay you 2 percent or a point and a half." that is an incentive for the owner of gold in private hands to bring that gold to the U.S. Treasury and say, "I'll take you up on that offer, U.S. Government. I trust the integrity of the U.S. Government."

Economically there is an incentive for the holder of gold to do that, because why? Because they are moving from holding an asset that costs them half a point a year to own to one that earns 2 points a year. That is a 2½ point move. That is why the owner of that gold has an economic incentive to come forward and return the transferred gold now held in bullion to the U.S. Government, and the U.S. Government will issue a bond to that holder of gold whereby in 30 or 40 years we would return the gold to them. That is how this system would work.

I believe we can use the gold bullion that would be brought to the Treasury of the United States and mint gold coins and sell them in the world market for cash and retire the short-term debt that is on the minds of all of us, some $3 trillion.

As to the gold the U.S. Government owns, 8,200 tons, no one has suggested in the whole history of banking or gold-backed currency in the world that a government has to have a dollar of gold behind each dollar of debt. No one has ever suggested that.

For instance, the commercial banking system today, if you put $1,000 into a bank in any place in this country, that bank is able by virtue of the fractional banking system to lend out $7,000 roughly. Banks create money out of deposits. That is how our fractional banking system functions.

What assurance do you have if your bank has lent out $7,000 that you will get your $1,000 back when you go to that bank? The only assurance you have is confidence that the banking system will function. Confidence is the way our system functions in the banking world.

The point I seek to make that is applicable to this argument of whether we have enough gold is that so long as people have the assurance that there is confidence in the system, they are going to have confidence that the U.S. Government will honor the obligation in 30 or 40 years to repay the gold.

I might recount to my colleague, the gentleman from California, what a private organization was able to do in this area. There is a mining company in America called Newmont Mining Co. They are in the gold mining business. About 2 years ago they borrowed half a billion dollars of gold bullion from the Bank of Nova Scotia and they sold that gold bullion on the world market for half a billion dollars cash money and they retired an equivalent amount of their debt that was being carried on their books at 8 percent per annum, and they gave a contract to the bank of Nova Scotia to return that gold in 5 years at 2½ percent interest. They effectively reduced the cost of maintaining a half billion dollars of their debt from 8 to 2½.

Now, if the Newmont Mining Co. is smart enough to figure out how to do that with the use of gold bond backing, and bear in mind that company had credibility to issue that repayment obligation, because why? They are in the gold mining business. I believe the U.S. Government can do the same thing.

The English ran the world for 200 years based on a pound backed by gold, a relatively small quantity of gold. The system operates on confidence, just as our banking system operates on confidence today.

This is why I believe with the gold stock the U.S. Government has and our ability to attract gold from the private holders around the world, we have an adequate gold supply to finance the scheme that I am talking about in this plan.

I guess as the bottom line, I can ask my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA], for whom I have the greatest respect, if the gentleman does not like the scheme, what is his plan?

Because quite candidly and honestly, we are looking, as I remarked earlier, in the decade of nineties to a string of increases in the national debt of $200 billion a year, and we are scheduled to increase our national debt by $240 billion this year. That to me is the measure of the deficit, not the phony figure we claim is compliance with Gramm-Rudman, but how much are we going to increase the national debt by?

We are on a course today where we are going to end up this century, I hope in our lifetimes, in the year 2000 with a national debt of $6 trillion or more. I do not know your assessment of the stewardship of this job that you want to leave your children or grandchildren. I do not choose to continue on a course where someday the unborn generation is going to look back to me and say, "Father or grandfather, why did you do this to us? Why did you create a course in the Nation's history where all you did was unload debt?"

That is the spirit in which I make this, and frankly, it should not be a partisan thing. I hope that as the weeks and the days and the months unfold, the wisdom of this scheme will reach in to the intellect and the annals of your mind and convince you that it is a viable opportunity.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I appreciate the gentleman yielding me this time.

I am very sorry that I did not get to comment on the budget that I intend to vote for, but I wanted to make two quick points.

One is that I am disappointed that there is not a targeting in any of the budgets offered today toward breast cancer research. When you consider that every 13 seconds a woman is diagnosed as having breast cancer, when you consider that 42,000 will die of breast cancer, and we have $17 million for research compared to $750 million increase in AIDS research, which I am all for, an increase in that area, but when you consider that 1 out of 9 women are dying and are diagnosed as having breast cancer, I think that is really unfortunate. I want to say to the Appropriations Committees when they look at this targeting, that they change it.

The other areas I am very concerned about is the area of alcohol education and treatment. The No. 1 drug in this country is still alcohol. With young people, 8 out of 9 accidents are caused by those teenagers driving who have been imbibing in alcoholic beverages, and yet we call it a drug that does not violate the law.

The fact is that when you drink and drive and you were too young and you overdrink and so on and kill people, that is against the law.

We ought to redefine what we mean by drugs in this country. I am going to put some statistics in here, because we have young kids who are 9 and 10 years old now imbibing in alcohol. We do not seem to have a conscience about that issue in this Congress, and I will be talking more about it in the future.

So I thank the Chairman for yielding this time to me and congratulate him on such a great job.

Mr. DANNEMEYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. DANNEMEYER].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. Stump for, with Mr. Thomas of Wyoming against.

Mr. Nielson of Utah for, with Mr. Hopkins against.

Mr. MOORHEAD changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

So the amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Illinois) having assumed the chair, Mr. GRAY, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 310) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, and 1995 had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, it was cleared with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT].

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I have asked to proceed for the purpose of receiving the schedule from the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, obviously our business for the day is finished, and there will be no more votes today. The House will have no legislative business on tomorrow.

On Monday, April 30, the House will meet at noon. However, there will be no legislative business.

On Tuesday, May 1, the House will meet at noon to take up again consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 310, the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1991. We hope to complete consideration that day.

There will also be suspensions on nine bills. However, recorded votes will be postponed until Wednesday, May 2.

The bills are:

H.R. 4557, the Department of Veterans Affairs Health Professionals Compensation and Labor Relations Act of 1990;

H.R. 4390, providing for veterans' affairs grants to assist medical schools in establishing new research centers;

H.R. 743, negotiated Rulemaking Act of 1989;

S. 1485, Quad Cities Interstate Metropolitan Authority Compact;

H. Res. 282, authorizing the printing of the joint committee print entitled "Medical Alert";

H.R. 3048, designating the "Virginia D. Smith Animal Health Research Laboratory";

H.R. 3248, boundary change at Gettysburg National Military Park in Pennsylvania;

H.R. 3209, boundary change at Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore; and

H.R. —, to extend certain exceptions for Federal and military retirees employed for the 1990 census.

On Wednesday, May 2, and Thursday, May 3, the House will meet at 2 p.m. on Wednesday and 11 a.m. on Thursday and will consider H.R. 4380, authorizing appropriations for the superconducting super collider, an open rule with 1 hour of debate.

On Friday, May 4, the House will not be in session.

Mr. GINGRICH. Let me ask the majority leader, if I might, first of all, as he knows, a number of Members on our side have been very, very concerned about the President's drug and violent crime package which has been up here now since June. Does the gentleman have some notion of when we might expect that to be reported out of the committee and to come to the floor?

Mr. GEPHARDT. I cannot give the gentleman from Georgia a precise time, but I can say that the leadership on this side has had a number of meetings with the committee chairs and subcommittee chairs involved. We have asked them to develop their legislation in this area, and we are going to get it on the floor as soon as we possibly can and have it considered by the House, and we want to do that in a manner so that we can complete legislation this year.

Mr. GINGRICH. Good. I appreciate that very much.

Also, I noticed that yesterday President Bush, as part of a package of reform he sent up, mentioned the balanced budget amendment which, of course, has been around a long time. Does the gentleman know if there is any possibility of that balanced budget amendment coming to the floor at some point during this session?

Mr. GEPHARDT. I do not know at this point exactly if or when that may happen. I will be happy to check with the committees that have that legislation within them and see what action might be taken.

Mr. GINGRICH. Two more immediate things. Does the gentleman have any notion as to when we might appoint conferees on the child care conference?

Mr. GEPHARDT. We hope to do that in the next week. We are not absolutely sure, but we hope to get it accomplished next week.

Mr. GINGRICH. Good. That would be very helpful. We are concerned about that, of course, and would like to try to produce a signable bill during the conference.

Lastly, it has been I think very embarrassing to the administration and to the country to have asked for an emergency supplemental for Nicaragua and Panama, and actually have had Mrs. Chamorro inaugurated before we could get it out of the other body. There does seem to be some hope that the other body may finally be done with the supplemental. Does the gentleman know if we might be able to expedite going to conference on that supplemental once it occurs?

Mr. GEPHARDT. As the gentleman knows, we in the House acted on that bill in a timely manner, and our appropriators are waiting for the Senate to finish, and we are going to try to get that done as quickly as possible.

Mr. GINGRICH. Good. I appreciate that. As the gentleman pointed out, the Democratic leadership in the House was very responsive. I think the House did its job almost as rapidly as one could conceivably have expected, and it was very unfortunate that it got tied up under other circumstances. But I think it would be helpful both to our country and our neighbors to the south if we could move on that, and I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GEPHARDT. We agree.

Mr. GINGRICH. Good. I yield back the balance of my time.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY NEXT

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order under the Calendar Wednesday rule be dispensed with on Wednesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1990

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at noon on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

FISHERIES AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GOVERNMENT OF PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 101-181)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, without objection, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and ordered to be printed:

(For message, see proceedings of the Senate of today, Thursday, April 26, 1990.)

RELEASE OF AMERICAN HOSTAGES

(Mr. ENGEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Speaker, there have been reports emanating out of terrorist circles that because of the Congress' resolution supporting Jerusalem as the united capital of Israel, the kidnapers of our hostages might now be reluctant to release any more hostages.

I state unequivocably that the U.S. Congress will not bow to pressure from kidnapers, murderers, terrorists, and thugs. President Bush is quite right when he says that the United States will make no deals with terrorists.

The fact is that the terrorist kidnapers will release our hostages when they deem it to be in their best interest to do so, not because they can be reasoned with or because they are nice people or because of what the U.S. Congress does or does not do.

Mr. Polhill was released because the Iranians who have control over some of the terrorists want better relations with the West to bolster their economy which is in shambles.

Mr. Speaker, our hostages should be released immediately with no strings attached. It is absolutely ridiculous for the same people who took the hostages now to tell the U.S. Congress what to do.

THE NO NEW TAXES PLEDGE

(Mr. HANCOCK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. HANCOCK. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to acknowledge the 86 courageous men who have taken a pledge to support the President's veto of any bill that contains tax increases by entering their names into the record. In 1988, the American people gave us a mandate of "no new taxes." These gentlemen who have signed the pledge to support the President have heard the American people and are standing firm on their promise and the 1988 Republican platform to oppose any attempts to increase taxes.

Mr. Speaker, today as we again take up the budget resolution the pressure exists to support the Democrats budget. I would like to point out that this budget contains $19.4 billion in tax increases which over a 5-year period will result in $117 billion in additional tax revenues. These tax increases are not only unnecessary, they are irresponsible.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the myth still exists that the only way to reduce the deficit to meet the necessary Gramm-Rudman target level of $64 billion is to increase taxes. This is absolutely not true. The only thing increased taxes will do and have ever done is to increase Government spending, resulting in an even higher deficit.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I congratulate these Members who understand that higher taxes are not acceptable, that higher taxes will not reduce the deficit and who have supported the American peoples mandate and have taken a stand against tax increases.

Mr. Speaker, I submit a copy of this letter into the RECORD directly following my statement.

A LETTER TO PRESIDENT GEORGE BUSH PROMISING SUPPORT FOR HIS VETO OF ANY TAX INCREASES

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We, the undersigned members of Congress, support your position—and the position of the 1988 Republican Platform—to oppose any attempts to increase taxes.

We will vote to sustain your veto of any legislation in the 101st Congress that raises taxes on the American people.

INDIAN HOUSING IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1990

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Illinois). Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BEREUTER. Mr. Speaker, late yesterday this Member introduced the Indian Housing Improvement Act of 1990, and hereby invites other interested Members to cosponsor this very necessary initiative.

Nationally, the Bureau of Indian Affairs estimates that some 93,000 Indian or Native American people live in substandard housing—but in reality, this number may be substantially higher. In Alaska, a State survey for substandard homes claimed that 6,740 new homes were needed; the Bureau of Indian Affairs reported that 5,246 new units were required in Alaska. At least, the number in that one State alone is very substantial.

Furthermore, the 1980 census reported that 23.3 percent of all Indians in Indian communities lacked adequate shelter. If 23.3 percent of all Americans generally lived in grossly overcrowded or inadequate housing, the national conscience would be horrified.

Many Indian people in substandard housing are subsisting, if that is the proper description, in conditions that find 10 people living in 2 rooms. Nearly ¼ of all Indian people on reservations live in homes that lack running water or indoor plumbing. Some Indian people live in cars, tents, or makeshift shelters, or move away from their families and homelands because transitional housing funds have not been available to Indian applicants.

Thus, as a central provision in the Indian Housing Improvement Act of 1990, an increased authorization for the construction of new housing units is included. While there is a desperate need for more units than those authorized by this bill, this number represents what can be reasonably built, given the length of time required for construction projects and given the limit on our financial resources.

This Member has also included amendments to the McKinney Homeless Act that will make Indian tribes eligible applicants for the emergency shelter grants program, the supportive housing demonstration program, and section 8 assistance for single room occupancy. Indian eligibility, it appears, was simply overlooked. This Member's proposal would also belatedly amend the McKinney Act to make Indian tribes eligible applicants under the community mental health services block grant. In addition, this proposal would allow the Secretary of the Interior to provide educational services for homeless Indian children who attend Bureau of Indian Affairs schools or schools operated by tribes under contract.

In addition, this Member believes that through the HUD programs, not only can we begin to solve many of the housing problems that Indian or Native American people face, we can also begin to make significant improvements to existing Housing programs that benefit Indians. For example, the bill this Member is introducing will correct an omission by making rehabilitation of units an eligible activity for Indian housing authorities under the mutual help program and by making Indian housing authorities eligible to participate in the section 8 voucher program.

The legislation also corrects a current problem by amendment to FmHA programs that would prevent alienation of trust lands in the event of a default on an FmHA loan, and authorizes a child care demonstration project to make grants for providing child care services in or near lower income housing developed or operated by Indian housing authorities. Finally, it allows the Secretary of HUD to waive any matching requirements in Indian housing programs under certain specified conditions, and provides a new authority for the use of Federal funds for matching funds.

These and the other provisions of the Indian Housing Improvement Act of 1990 should at least help address many of the problems encountered in Indian country—from services for the very most vulnerable individuals—the homeless—to improvements and assistance in rehabilitating existing units and protecting the availability of the existing housing stock on the Nation's Indian reservations.

This Member plans to offer many of the provisions included in this bill during next week's markup of H.R. 1180, the Housing and Community Development Act of 1990 by the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. Other very crucial elements of the legislation will require a longer term effort, and the support of other Members of Congress will be needed and greatly appreciated. As a start this Member urges cosponsorship of this important and long overdue Indian housing reform legislations.

VACATING 60-MINUTE SPECIAL ORDER AND AUTHORIZING 5-MINUTE SPECIAL ORDER

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my 60-minute special order for today be vacated and that I be permitted to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the subject of my special order today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL LIBRARY WEEK

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, each year during National Library Week I take out a special order in recognition of the service that our libraries provide nationwide. We had scheduled a special order for yesterday. Many Members submitted statements.

Mr. Speaker, I usually begin my special order with a reading of the message from the President. Since I am going to condense this into 5 minutes instead of 60 minutes, I merely want to read one paragraph from the President's letter on National Library Week.

That paragraph states:

Throughout our Nation's history, libraries have been recognized as an invaluable educational tool. For children, the library is a magic kingdom to explore. For adults, it is a resource center as well as a storehouse of literature.

Mr. Speaker, the letter from the White House is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, April 19, 1990.

Barbara and I are delighted to send our warmest greetings to everyone celebrating the 33rd annual observance of National Library Week.

Throughout our Nation's history, libraries have been recognized as an invaluable educational tool. For children, the library is a magic kingdom to explore. For adults, it is a resource center as well as a storehouse of literature.

This year's Library Week theme, "Reach for a Star. Ask a Librarian," salutes the well-trained and knowledgeable professionals at every local library. I call on our citizens to express their appreciation to their local librarians for their tremendous work in serving the public—for all ages and from all walks of life.

During Library Week we also recognize that many adults do not enjoy the services that our libraries offer because they are unable to read. Illiteracy is one of America's most fundamental concerns. All of us can help overcome this problem by encouraging those who cannot read to enroll in literacy classes and by reminding parents to read to their young children.

Barbara and I have always been avid readers, and we continue to share our love of books with our 12 grandchildren. We urge every American to read—as much as you can and as often as you can. Take this opportunity to discover all that your local library has to offer.

GEORGE BUSH.

Despite the fact that the President has praised libraries, and despite the fact that the President has declared himself the education President, this administration, in its budget submission, has cut the Library Services and Construction Act by $100 million. The administration budget cuts library programs from $137 million to $40 million. Increases in interlibrary cooperation and literacy are more than offset by the zero and out LSCA title I and title II. No substitute legislation has been proposed for fiscal year 1991.

In my State of New York, we received $7.5 million in Federal Library Services and Construction Act funds. These include $5.2 million for public library services and $1 million for library construction and $1.3 million for interlibrary cooperation and resource sharing, one example of what the cut would mean. At the same time there are cuts at the State level and there are cuts at city level. Everyone is acknowledging that education is important. Our Governor of New York has declared this the "Decade of the Child." Our mayor has said that his administration will be devoted to children, and yet library services are being cut. We acknowledge the fact that education is of great importance, yet library services are being cut.

The President and the administration have set forth certain goals on education. Six major goals to work toward between now and the year 2000. Each one of those goals, including the goal that we should be No. 1 in math and science by the year 2000, and the goal that we should have 100-percent literacy by the year 2000 are goals that require that people know how to read. Young people, students cannot progress in science and math if they do not know how to read. Studies have shown Members that our young people read more books in the fourth grade than they do in the seventh grade. Part of the problem is that they have no exposure to opportunities to read books. Therefore, cuts in library services are really cuts in opportunities for education.

Since I do not have time to enumerate on each one of the goals, I would like to just make a brief statement on the benefits of the Library Services Construction Act, and ask that a written statement which contains each of these messages be entered into the RECORD. The Library Services Construction Act is a statement on that: Higher Education Act Title II Grant Program, and what that funding means; postal revenue foregone; the Library of Congress; information superhighway; access to Government information. All of these are written statements that I will have entered into the RECORD, with an explanation of the family learning centers, which is a new part of title VIII of Library Services Construction Act.

LIBRARY SERVICES AND CONSTRUCTION ACT

Federal aid for library services provided through the Library Services and Construction Act [LSCA] is small, but this investment is vital because it is targeted to support programs and services which otherwise could not or would not be adequately funded. LSCA dollars are put to work in every congressional district to support: The extension and improvement of services to communities which are unserved or underserved by libraries; library services for the elderly, the disadvantaged, and others for whom the provision of such services demands extra effort or special materials and equipment; the construction and renovation of library facilities, including those needed to make libraries accessible to persons with disabilities; and interlibrary cooperative networks which link libraries and their resources across city, county, and State lines to expand the information and other services available to our constituents.

The administration, however, has proposed to slash this critical Federal investment by nearly $100 million and to eliminate LSCA titles I and II. In my own State of New York, the impact of the loss of title I funds alone would be devastating. For example, home visits and other services provided by the New York Public Library to 36,000 disadvantaged and elderly persons would be terminated. Library-sponsored radio reading services for homebound persons living in rural and isolated areas would be eliminated. Education and Job Information Centers located in local libraries would be shut down, depriving 400,000 users of this important source of information about available job and education services.

The President's budget proposal is also disappointing because it calls for the repeal and defunding of several important improvements made in the act in the recently enacted LSCA amendments of 1989—Public Law 101-254. Fully implementing and funding these improvements will also help us to advance toward meeting the education goals promulgated by the President and the Governors.

A new title VIII was created by Public Law 101-254 to support Library Learning Center programs at State and local public library agencies. Part A of title VIII, which I authored, authorizes $3 million for direct grants of up to $200,000 to local public libraries "to expand and improve opportunities for lifetime learning and the involvement of the Nation's families as partners in their children's education by providing comprehensive, family-oriented library services through Family Learning Centers."

At least 25 percent of the grant funds must be used for materials on child care and development, nutrition, parenting skills, and job and career information; and materials for children and adolescents. At least 10 percent of grant funds must be used for computer hardware and software which will be available for use by the public.

Grant applications must include assurance that as part of the Family Learning Center Program the library will be open evenings, Saturdays, and some Sundays and holidays to be convenient for working parents; provide staff with specialized training; establish an advisory committee which includes parents and other representatives of the community; establish a Family Library Loan Program; provide job and career information; and conduct special outreach activities to draw teen parents, single-parent families, and working parents to the library.

Priority is to be given to applications which "first, promise to serve a significant number of families on a regular basis; and offer innovative approaches to improving library services for families and approaches which show promise for replication and dissemination." Grants must be equitably distributed among States and between urban and rural communities.

Part B of title VIII authorizes $3 million for discretionary grants to support "model library literacy centers throughout the country to serve as resource centers for the dissemination of literacy materials and equipment to local public libraries" to assist them in addressing the needs of adults with limited literacy skills.

The LSCA amendments also permit State library agencies to use LSCA funds to address two critical problems facing public libraries: Technology and preservation. To provide help with meeting the staggering costs of purchasing and maintaining new information technology, States may now use a portion of their title II construction grants to acquire, install, or maintain technological equipment needed to provide access to information in electronic and other machine-readable formats. Assistance in meeting the emerging preservation needs of libraries is provided by an amendment to LSCA title III which permits State library agencies to use these funds to develop and implement statewide preservation cooperation plans through which endangered library resources can be systematically and cost-effectively preserved.

HIGHER EDUCATION ACT TITLE II GRANT PROGRAMS

Through HEA title II, Federal aid is provided to strengthen the collections of needy college libraries, to support fellowships for training in library and information science, to broaden access to information through the use of new technologies, and to purchase foreign periodicals.

POSTAL REVENUE FORGONE

Coming at the same time that the Postal Service has filed for a general rate increase, cuts proposed by the President in Federal support for preferred postal rates for libraries would result in massive postage rate increases which library budgets are ill-prepared to absorb. Interlibrary loans and rural books-by-mail programs would be drastically scaled back, if not eliminated altogether, and libraries in every community would be forced to shift scarce resources away from the purchase of new materials to pay for the new higher postage rates.

THE LIBRARY OF CONGRESS

Appropriations for the Library of Congress benefit libraries of all types in every community. The Library provides libraries in our districts with most of the cataloging and classification information they need for their collections. Through a system of regional libraries and depository collections, the Library provides access to books and periodicals in braille and recorded formats to millions of blind and visually impaired readers across the country. And by serving as the Nation's lending library of the last resort, the Library provides Americans with access to rare books and materials which would otherwise be unavailable.

INFORMATION SUPERHIGHWAY

Librarians support proposals for Federal funding to develop a National Research and Education Network [NREN]—or information superhighway—which would link supercomputers, national databases, academic and industrial researchers, and libraries through a unified, high-speed computer network. At a library linked to the proposed NREN, our constituents could obtain the texts of journal articles in electronic formats; a physician could transmit 3-dimensional x rays and CAT-scans to a specialist in another part of the country, and the smallest high-technology firm would have quick access to the same state-of-the-art scientific information as the largest conglomerate.

ACCESS TO GOVERNMENT INFORMATION

Libraries are concerned about proposed legislation that would fundamentally erode the ability of depository libraries to serve our constituents by requiring contributions or user fees for access to government information. With libraries located in every congressional district, the depository system has helped assure that every American has access to information by and about their government-information that, after all, their tax dollars paid for in the first place. The great cost burden of maintaining depository collections is borne completely by participating libraries without a penny of Federal aid. Imposing additional costs on depositories and their users would threaten the survival of this essential government information dissemination channel.

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay homage to librarians of America during this week that is named in their honor. Just as importantly, however, I want to add my name to those who view this as a most appropriate time to consider the special work that our libraries do for all of us, to note where we could be as a society if we gave them the support that they deserve, and, sadly, where we are headed if we continue to neglect this Nation's library system.

How many of us have ever forgotten the first time that we entered that book-lined hall that seemed so huge, so formidable, and maybe even a bit eerie. Maybe the smell was a bit musty, certainly it was different from any other we had experienced as a young child. But even as we became more familiar with that place, came to understand that the books were there for us to read and to learn from, we often encountered greater mysteries in those stories about fictional people, strange places, and great adventures of the kind we had never seen before in our real lives.

But even as we were mystified, we grew in knowledge, in understanding of the world, its rainbow of people and places, and about ourselves. The library thus became a place that took us outside and beyond ourselves, expanded our horizons and elevated our dreams. For many of us, the books we found there planted the seeds of the work we would do later in life; for many of us, those books have much to do with who we came to be. Truly, the library was to many of us more than a room or a building; it was an incubator that nurtured children into adults, that drew knowledge out of ignorance.

That is the work of our libraries: They are places that can build wonderful dreams out of hopelessness; they can heal the saddest emotions; and they can plant seeds of ambition that we can then strive to achieve.

That is why I support National Library Week and why I would call on my colleagues to support adequate funding of our libraries for construction of library buildings, for books and for outreach programs that find ways to reach people of all socioeconomic levels.

Support of our libraries are not expenses for this society; they are among our most important investments. One word, one lesson learned from a book may be enough to save one child or 1,000 from the hopelessness that otherwise may lead them to drug abuse or to crime. One ray of hope, instilled through a story read in a tale of adventure, might be just enough to inspire that child who might otherwise be lost.

We must continue to invest in our libraries; we can do no less for the future of our children.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from New York for reserving this time to commemorate the 33d annual observance of National Library Week.

If this Nation is to be wise as well as strong, if we are to achieve our destiny, then we need more new ideas for more wise men reading more good books in more public libraries.

This quote is as relevant today as it was when it was phrased 30 years ago by President John F. Kennedy.

The more advanced and complex our world becomes, the more knowledge we must acquire. Much of this new knowledge is based on the wisdom of the past. There is no better source than our Nation's libraries for learning about the past, so that we may improve the present and assure our future.

Libraries are an invaluable and often overlooked resource. Where else, other than in a library, is knowledge and information accumulated, cataloged, and made readily and easily available to everyone?

In my State of Illinois, there are approximately 3,000 school, public, academic, and special libraries. Over 25,000 people are employed, full or part time, in the libraries of Illinois. The money earned by Illinois' library employees, the money used to purchase books and other library materials, the earnings of local suppliers, the funds used for the acquisition and maintenance of buildings, and telecommunications and other utilities is recycled into other areas of the State's economy. The library industry is a vital component of Illinois' economy as an employer, a consumer, and a distributor.

The theme for this year's National Library Week is "Reach for a star, ask a librarian." There are presently more than 152,000 librarians and related professionals working in our Nation's libraries. These dedicated individuals have been in the forefront of many of the most important issues facing America today: literacy, censorship, education, intellectual freedom, and public access to government information. I congratulate them and applaud their valiant efforts.

Without a strong commitment on the part of Federal, State, and local governments to effectively support our Nation's libraries, the continuance of the valuable services they provide may be threatened.

Several funding bills now pending in the House have a direct impact on the variety and scope of services America's libraries can offer the public. Let us demonstrate our commitment to our Nation's library system when these measures come to the floor for a vote.

Mr. TOWNS. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to encourage my colleagues, during this National Library Week, to ensure full funding of programs which help maintain and improve the Nation's public library services.

In my own district, the public library system has become a very important provider of services to children and adults alike. However, I am disturbed that the Brooklyn Public Library must struggle to maintain many excellent programs, like the Education/Job Information Center, the Child's Place, and adult literacy tutoring, due to chronically inadequate funding. Public library hours were recently cut in response to budget shortfalls. Library officials inform me that cuts in Federal Library Services and Construction Act appropriations would cost at least two staff positions and a large portion of the library's book acquisition budget.

The Library Services and Construction Act has been signed into law, but many other pending measures deserve the full support of Congress as we shape the budget for fiscal year 1991. Upcoming postal rate increases threaten to bleed funds away from sorely needed literacy and child centered library activities, unless we move to protect Federal support for preferred postal rates for libraries. While Congress must find new ways to raise revenues to deal with the national budget deficit, proposed user fees for access to government information is a form of double taxation that we should not impose on taxpaying users and beneficiaries of library services.

Most importantly, protecting library services on the national, State, and local levels must be a priority if we intend to advance as a nation in the next decade and the next century. The coming age demands not only the full literacy of our citizens, but also a work force capable of lifetime learning. Our support for the many worthwhile library services now being developed and refined will ensure that we have built the foundation for a literate, flexible, and well-educated American work force for the 21st century.

Mr. ROE. Mr. Speaker, America's libraries stand as a testament to the endurance of its culture. They represent our country's commitment to learning and its determination to educate future generations of Americans.

Libraries are the guardians of our intellectual legacy and the protectors of our civilization's recorded history. From the small circulating libraries in our local communities to the great dome of our own Library of Congress, we have built a network of knowledge in this Nation. More important, we have nurtured a respect for the free expression and dissemination of ideas.

A library serves a community far broader than the people who cross its threshold. The rural books-by-mail services, the large-print books to the visually impaired—all the diverse library services to the disabled and the disadvantaged are outreaches into our communities to bring knowledge and enrichment to everyone from young children to the elderly.

The preferred postal rates that libraries receive make it possible for them to continue many of these outreach services. The interlibrary loan programs that connect our local, and regional libraries in an information network are dependent on postal preference for survival. We must continue to support this postal preference if we expect our libraries to continue this important work.

As chairman of the Science, Space, and Technology Committee, I want to specifically mention the National Research and Education Network [NREN] which is proposed in title XI of H.R. 3131. I have cosponsored this legislation with many colleagues on both the Science, Space, and Technology Committee and the Energy and Commerce Committee. This network would link supercomputers, national databases, academic and industrial researchers, and libraries through a high-speed computer system. I would urge my colleagues to support H.R. 3131, the National High-Performance Computer Technology Act of 1989, as it moves through the legislative process. This legislation will dramatically advance the availability and dissemination of critical scientific information to researchers across the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, Samuel Johnson said, "knowledge is of two kinds. We know a subject ourselves, or we know where we can find information on it." With the information explosion that we are living in today, all of us are increasingly dependent on places to find organized and readily available knowledge because we cannot hope to know or even know of all the useful knowledge that is generated every day.

Libraries and new high technology information networks are both repositories of what we know as well as bridges to what we will need to know in the future. Samuel Johnson also said, "the future is purchased by the present." Let us not forget this when we are asked to support funding for these important efforts.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise today in observance of National Library Week, to thank and honor the many librarians and library volunteers who maintain centers of knowledge for all Americans. In our libraries we can research the topics of our choice, attend lectures, classes, and movies on issues which interest us, and borrow books which take our minds into historical adventures, distant cultures and fantasy lands.

It is hard for me to conceive of a fully satisfying life without the pleasures of reading. Unfortunately, illiteracy deprives too many Americans of this joy. The Department of Education estimates that between 17 and 21 million people in the United States are illiterate. This is 13 percent of the adult population, and in New York, where the rate is conservatively 16 percent, this situation is even worse. Libraries and the people who run them are an essential resource in the literacy fight. In the 21st District of New York, which I represent, and around the Nation, libraries are conducting adult literacy programs, such as one on one tutoring projects, and English classes.

Additionally, our libraries provide us with a myriad of important community services such as job information centers, reading programs for disadvantaged children, and projects to keep senior citizens active. In the mid-Hudson Valley of New York, the library sponsored job information centers help residents locate possible employment opportunities, write their resumes, and fill out job applications. Story hours keep children interested in learning and the Lively Minds Program encourages seniors to write poetry, remain informed about their community, and continue to read.

As the president of the Board of Trustees of the Alice Desmond and Hamilton Fish Library, which serves Garrison, NY, my interest in libraries extends beyond my love of reading. Direct involvement with our library enables me to witness firsthand the vital role that a library plays in the life of a community. The Alice Desmond and Hamilton Fish Library sponsors parent/child workshops, art exhibitions, literacy programs, talks and concerts, as well as housing 15,000 volumes.

I believe most would agree that the expansion of our libraries into community services is an advantageous situation. Unfortunately, President Bush's budget proposal appropriates zero funds for title I and title II of the Library Services and Construction Act. If Congress does not allot monies for title I of the LSCA many of the library services which help the disadvantaged, unemployed, illiterate and elderly will receive no Federal funds. I know for the Alice Desmond and Hamilton Fish Library these drastic funding reductions will mean the effective end to the Literacy Volunteer Program.

Title II funds are responsible for giving money to libraries to expand or refurbish their physical buildings. Oftentimes this money is spent making our libraries accessible for the elderly and disabled. Because all Americans should be able to take advantage of the many services our libraries offer, I believe this money is being well spent, and should not be zeroed out.

It has been said that "A great library contains the diary of the human race." In today's world our libraries not only house the history of mankind, but also serve as a guide to the future. The community services which our libraries provide brighten our Nation's future by teaching illiterate adults how to read, and encouraging our children to continue to read, aiding the unemployed in their search for a job, and making sure our senior citizens keep their intellects' active. Let's ensure that funds for these positive programs are reauthorized.

It is my privilege to stand today and honor the libraries, librarians and library volunteers who contribute so much to the education and pure enjoyment of our Nation.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, a White House Conference on Library and Information Services will be held in Washington during July 1991. The Conference will bring together library users, trustees, and friends groups, civic leaders, lawmakers, and librarians to develop recommendations for the improvement of the Nation's libraries.

The Conference will cover such topics as how public libraries can more effectively support literacy training and adult education programs, how to provide business and industry with improved access to needed information, how to meet the needs of children, senior citizens and the disabled, and how to better provide individuals in remote or economically deprived areas equal access to information.

The Conference will also address the concerns of other types of libraries besides public libraries. Much has been written about the problems of America's educational system and many solutions have been proposed to alleviate these problems. In order for our schools, colleges, and universities to be able to offer the curriculum needed and to provide the foundation needed to educate our students, the needs of the libraries at the hearts of these institutions must also be addressed and solutions formulated to the problems that confront them.

Recommendations resulting from the White House Conference will establish this Nation's agenda for library services for the first part of the 21st century. It is vitally important that America's libraries continue to explore ways to satisfy the diverse needs of our equally diverse population.

Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly support the goals of the White House Conference on Library and Information Services, and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. RAVENEL. Mr. Speaker, our country's libraries provide many services for all citizens, but the elderly seem to possess a special need for informational and recreational materials.

Public libraries in South Carolina and around the country have used title I funds obtained under the Library Services and Construction Act to develop new and innovative programs to reach the elderly. These programs range from providing large print books and books on tape to conducting storytimes and poetry readings in nursing homes to delivering books and other materials to homebound elderly patrons.

Many active senior citizens who are in good health would like to take advantage of all the good things a library can offer, but they do not have the opportunity. Let me give you an illustration of what can be accomplished with LSCA funds. Last year, in my district, the Colleton County Library was able to establish a library branch in the town of Edisto Beach using funds from this project. Prior to this branch, the residents of Edisto Beach had only very limited bookmobile service. The only alternative for the townspeople, most of whom are over 55, was to either drive 100 miles roundtrip to the Collection County Library in Walterboro or to purchase a Charleston County Library card and utilize out-of-county facilities which were still many miles away. Now the elderly residents of this community can take advantage of the information, recreational reading materials, programs, and services offered by the new branch library in their town.

Worthwhile projects like this are possible all over the United States, but only if public libraries are able to obtain the necessary funds to develop and implement them. LSCA funds are vital to the continuation and expansion of these programs for our senior citizens.

Mr. WELDON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend my colleague, Mr. OWENS, for taking time today to call this special order. As Congress continues to debate the Federal budget, it is fitting that we take this time to discuss one of the greatest treasures of America.

As a former teacher and the father of five, I fully understand the important role libraries play in our educational system. Books contain all the magic to fill a young child's dream and the information for a student's term paper. Libraries inspire the mind and help make learning an exciting experience.

Yesterday morning, a newspaper in my home district, the Delaware County Daily Times, ran a feature story on the innovative programs which the Delaware County Library System has adopted to increase the access of all citizens to its materials. By computerizing all of the holdings in the 27-member library system, users will have instant information as to the location of more than 1 million books. I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

LIBRARY LISTS ITS BOOKS ON COMPUTER

(By Joe Hart)

MEDIA.—Computerized cataloguing in Delaware County's 27-member library system literally puts 1 million books at the fingertips of the curious, officials announced last week.

The system—dubbed DCLS Delphi—replaces the traditional card catalogs that have been library staples for generations.

But while those card catalogs could tell only what was in each particular library, the Delphi terminals are programmed with the inventory of the entire library system—more than 1 million books in all, Library Services Director Harry Courtright said.

Some 64 Delphi stations have been set up in the libraries at a cost of about $325,000, Courtright said. The initial terminals were supplied to member libraries for free, though branches can purchase additional stations for about $3,300 each.

All of the county's major libraries have them and even the smallest will be fitted within a week.

Delphi terminals allow patrons to search for books by title, authority or subject. Even partial titles or authors names can be keyed in, with the computer supplying the rest of the information.

The system tells researchers whether particular books are checked out at each library. When more programs are added to the memory, the computer will be able to tell its user when the books will be returned, Courtright said.

"It's a tremendous resource for the libraries in Delaware County and the people who use them," he said.

The menu-driven system tells users what to do every step of the way. And an attached telephone offers recorded advice on how to operate the terminal.

"They're really user-friendly," Courtright said.

Officials were initially concerned that library patrons—especially those who might not be "computer literate"—would be put off by the new system. But that hasn't been the case.

"The staff has given the patrons very little help," said Lansdowne librarian Linda Kennedy. "We just plugged it in, turned it on, and let it go and they've had no trouble using it. Everybody seems really excited about it."

Kennedy, a librarian at Lansdowne for a decade, said she won't miss the old card catalogs.

"I can't wait till ours goes out the door," she said. "It's just so much easier * * * I just love this. I don't have to hunt from drawer to drawer and bend over."

There's usually a down side to computer automation, however, and the Delphi system is no exception—for those who don't return their books on time. Within a year, when the computer's programming is finished, deadbeats will run into problems.

"It will also tell you who owes money and it won't let you take books out" until the debt is paid, Courtright said.

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my distinguished colleagues in saluting our public, school, college, and special libraries as we celebrate National Library Week. With the passage of time, the importance and breadth of services provided to American society by our libraries have rapidly increased. No longer are libraries merely passive repositories of books and related materials; today's library serves the expanding needs of every segment of society.

Libraries provide access to information in a wide variety of media—books, periodicals, videotapes, sound recordings, even personal computer software. They are community information centers, providing information on all manner of public services offered by public and private organizations—employment services, artistic exhibitions, aid to the elderly, or recent immigrants, et cetera. They provide space and support for voter registration, personal income tax preparation assistance, or meeting space for a range of community organizations, from Girl and Boy Scouts to great books discussion groups. Most recently, many libraries have been addressing the enormous problem of adult illiteracy by providing basic literacy instruction in libraries, including the establishment of family learning centers serving adults and their school-age children.

Public and other libraries throughout the Nation are assisted not only by Federal programs such as the Library Services and Construction Act, and the Depository Library Program, but also by Federal libraries, especially the Library of Congress. In addition to its services to the Congress, through the Congressional Research Service and other units, plus direct services to the public at its Capitol Hill facilities, the Library of Congress provides essential support to libraries nationwide. For example, it has been estimated that the cataloging services provided by the Library of Congress saved the Nation's libraries over $350 million in fiscal year 1989 alone. The Library of Congress provides books and other materials through interlibrary loans, answers reference inquiries, produces traveling exhibits that appear throughout the Nation, is the Nation's primary source for library services to blind and physically handicapped readers, conducts research into the cost-saving uses of such new forms of information technology as compact laser disks, and leads national activity in preservation of books and other library materials.

The libraries are our Nation's information infrastructure. We must care for those precious resources and promote their usage and preservation. National Library Week is a fitting occasion to recall this obligation.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, as we are all no doubt aware, recent statistics show a high rate of illiteracy in America. Unemployed individuals having inadequate reading and writing skills comprise a significant component of these figures. Illiterate adults have great difficulty not only in finding work, but in performing vital tasks necessary to daily living such as maintaining a checking account, filling out forms, and communicating with others.

In order to solve the problem of illiteracy, cooperation amongst the various Federal, State, local, and voluntary agencies involved in this effort must be encouraged. I am proud to say that the libraries in my State of South Carolina are providing a vital link between the illiterate and the improvement of their reading skills. Twelve county libraries in South Carolina received over $100,000 in title I funds to provide new-reader materials, computer equipment, and software programs, and to supply tutoring space for volunteers to work with those adults who are learning to read. All 12 of these libraries which received grants worked in conjunction with other organizations involved in literacy efforts such as the United Way, South Carolina Department of Social Services, and Literacy Volunteers of America.

In addition to the title I grants, the South Carolina State Library also received a title VI grant in conjunction with the South Carolina State Department of Corrections to develop and implement a program of literacy training in South Carolina's prisons. Studies report that a majority of inmates in South Carolina are functionally illiterate. Helping to provide them with the skills of reading and writing gives these inmates an opportunity to become more productive members of society upon their release.

The problem of illiteracy is great, but progress is being made. Continued LSCA funding is absolutely essential for the development and promotion of our statewide literacy education efforts and I urge my colleagues to support such funding.

Mrs. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, today, I am pleased to join many of my colleagues in observing National Library Week.

The public library is one of many institutions that determines the quality of life in our communities. Unfortunately, many of our public library buildings are not large enough or modern enough to accommodate the growth in population. More space, modern automation, computer technology, and building renovation are needed in order to meet the demands of a growing population and provide adequate facilities for citizens in the community.

Title II of the Library Services and Construction Act provides incentive grants to communities to raise matching funds for construction and renovation of public library buildings. In 1989 alone, title II construction planning involved 21 projects in 18 counties in my State of South Carolina. There is still a need for 22 additional new or expanded headquarters buildings and 50 new or enlarged library branches. At an average cost of $65 per square foot for new public library construction, it would take over $65 million to meet this need for additional space.

Continued support at an adequate level is necessary in order to encourage communities to provide modern public library facilities for their citizens throughout the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to join the gentleman from New York in recognizing the contributions of our Nation's libraries and the Library Services and Construction Act that keep them going.

Mr. SPRATT. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the special orders today in recognition of National Library Week. During this week, we take time to pay tribute to the many services that our libraries provide.

If the United States is to grow and prosper, we need to provide a high caliber of educational programs for our children. Research has shown that exposure to books and reading at an early age is an important factor to success in school. Public libraries play a vital role in this area by encouraging parents to read to their children and by introducing children to the world of books and reading. The President's National Goals for Education suggest that every parent be their children's first teacher. Therefore, it is vitally important for our public libraries to have the materials parents will need to work with their children.

Title I funds provided by the Library Services and Construction Act [LSCA] have been used to hire children's librarians, to purchase children's books and other materials, and to sponsor special programs such as summer reading clubs. In 1989 alone, over 35,000 children in South Carolina participated in the Statewide Reading Program and more than 150,000 attended at least one special program during the year at their local public library. Another 150,000 children throughout the State were introduced to the library during class visits or other Outreach programs.

The year of 1989 was designated the "Year of the Young Reader" in South Carolina. The theme of activities, "Give us books, give us wings," emphasized the importance of encouraging children to read and to grow with books. The year of the young reader culminated with the observance of Young Reader's Day on November 15, 1989. More than 600,000 children and adults across South Carolina participated in Young Reader's Day activities.

The future of our country depends on helping today's children become tomorrow's literate and informed citizens. Public libraries are enthusiastically working to meet this challenge, and LSCA funding is vital to this effort.

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, the week of April 23 to 27, 1990 is being celebrated as it is every year as "National Library Services Week."

As in past years, I was so pleased yesterday to be able to meet with the able representatives of libraries and their needs from the State of West Virginia, and of course my own Fourth District.

For 8 long years during the Reagan administration I met with those good friends of mine on library needs, and we were firm in our resolve to bring about the rejection of President Reagan's proposals to zero fund libraries. And we were successful year after year.

When President Bush came to office, and knowing of his and Barbara's interest and concern for illiteracy in this country, I had high hopes that the library programs long supported, on a bipartisan basis, by the Congress, would encounter no threat from his Presidency.

Not so, Mr. Bush says the same thing that Mr. Reagan said—Federal support for libraries is no longer necessary. States can now take over and fund their remaining needs.

Not so—libraries—like our schools, roads, and bridges—have infrastructure needs—a library built and equipped 10 to 20 years ago need structural repairs, some have grown to need room to expand to serve their communities, others have obsolete technologies that need updating to more modern, state-of-the-art modes of operation.

I know and I even appreciate the President's greetings to those participating in this, the 33d annual observance of National Library Week. I regret that their love of books and of reading does not lend itself to today's information revolution.

The President proposed cutting 71 percent from current Federal funding for libraries—and that encompassed both public and academic libraries.

In 1987, Mr. Speaker, West Virginia had 181 libraries. Today, it has 178 libraries. Some have had to close, for lack of support. The State and most assuredly the local areas in my district, the county commissions, the local school boards, can no longer afford to include library needs in their budgets, and those who can have had to impose drastic cuts in the amount of funding available.

Yet Federal funding, Mr. Speaker, represents a mere 4 percent of public library support; the rest comes from local taxes and public donations.

I think we can afford, and I am confident my colleagues in the House will agree with me, to continue to provide this miniscule, yet desperately needed resource for this Nation's 115,000 public, school, academic, and special libraries serving the public.

I extend a warm hand of welcome to my own friends of libraries from my State and district, and to the thousands of others who came from all the States and territories to celebrate National Library Week.

I know that our folks back home are busily preparing for the important preliminary State conferences about to take place in all the States, so that they will arrive in the Nation's Capital in a state of readiness to conduct the second White House Conference on Library Information and Services scheduled to take place in the near future.

On this important occasion, the Federal role in library services will be fully explored, and resolutions adopted by delegates to the Conference to improve and enhance that role.

NICARAGUAN ELECTION PROCESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAYES of Illinois). Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I was fortunate enough to join, with about 10 or so Congressmen and women and about 5 or 6 Members of the Senate, a delegation to Nicaragua yesterday to see the fulfillment of a 10-year effort to bring freedom to that torn little nation.

Nicaragua is a nation of not quite 3 million people, 600,000 of whom are in exile. Of course, unlike our election process which allows Americans overseas to participate and vote, they were not allowed to vote. Now, I understand that some of the network coverage last night showed the bizarre scene which occurred yesterday in their main stadium in the capital city of Managua. If you recall, during what the New York Times called a "treacherous transition period," the winning presidential candidate and distinguished lady, Violeta Chamorro, had to negotiate with the Sandinista Communists on just how her election victory could be transformed by a valid inauguration. Here is what they came up with and I hope that any person who hears my voice or reads the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, will treasure the system we have and understand the difference.

I mean, I was trying to picture what happened in Managua happening on the Mall, during one of the inaugurations that I have been fortunate enough to be a part of. One with President Carter, two with President Reagan, and one just last year with President Bush. Imagine having to separate the Mall, putting all the Republicans on one side and all the Democrats on the other. Then imagine letting the loser speak, not for a gracious 5 minutes, but a 50-minute harangue with rhetorical challenges to your Republicans or your Democrats such as, "Who killed my brother," to which one side of the mall would respond, "They did," all the while screaming, pointing fingers. And then imagine turning to the British representation and saying, "Here, there, the British will die; here, there, the British will die." Well, that was the scene in the stadium in Managua yesterday. The stadium separated the supporters of Violeta Chamorro who, interestingly, were waving the flag of Nicaragua, their flag since 1821. On the other side, with the colors of black and red, were the Sandinistas.

By the way, the Sandinista stronghold during the election was the capital city, because they had the city on the payroll with money borrowed from Cuba and Russia. In Managua, guess what the breakdown was in the stadium? Fully every seat taken on the Chamarro UNO side, with UNO representing 13 parties, the United National Organization. Every seat taken. On the other side, the Sandinista side, there were huge gaps and open sections. The Sandinista organizers paid some of their people, yet they could not even fill their side. Those of us in attendance, liberal and conservative, estimated the UNO-Sandinista split at about 70/30. Folks, that is the way the election would have turned out if it had been truly fair. Not 55-45 but 70-30. Violeta Chamorro had at least 15 percent of the votes stolen from her, but the margin was so big they still had to call it a landslide.

What happened when Daniel Ortega came into the stadium? He wanted to go to the side where 70 percent of the people are flying the blue and white flag. He knows he paid many of the people to come to the black and red Communist Sandinista side. He does not get 10 feet and the booing is so horrible he has to pull back and come to the Sandinista side. He is dressed in sort of a Gucci revolutionary style. His common-law wife, Rosa Ria, is wearing a black and red scarf wrapped around one knee of her designer jeans. She is in a Texas-style blouse. He is in an open shirt and denims. As Senator DODD said, at least he wasn't in the cockamamy fatigues like Castro.

Violeta Chamorro, when she comes in, goes to the Sandinista side. They start throwing water balloons at her. Some threw pop bottles—at least one or two of those. She has to run this gauntlet, but she makes her driver go slowly. Now, at first I saw that the water-filled balloons, were falling short. I thought, they have the wind, but they do not have the range. Suddenly, one went over her head, and then another one. Then they had the range and wind. Any minute one could have hit her in the face.

The ladies understand, the men too, with their hair spray, that a person would not look their best when hit by a balloon. I am praying to God, "Do not let a balloon hit her, please Lord." None hit her. It was like there was a bubble around her. They were going high, low, left, right. The guard soldiers were throwing themselves, catching balloons in the face, in the chest, with their arms. They did not get one close. When she took that oath after the 50-minute harangue of Daniel Ortega to the Communists, she spoke beautifully and powerfully, and she has united that country.

Vaya con dios, Madam President.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO HELP GUARDSMEN AND RESERVISTS WHO SERVED DURING ATOMIC EXPERIMENTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HARRIS] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced legislation which will provide selected veterans benefits to a small group of National Guardsmen and Reservists who participated in the atmospheric tests of nuclear devices during World War II. These guardsmen and reservists will be granted the same service connection as those provided for active duty personnel under Public Law 100-321, the Radiation-Exposed Veterans Compensation Act of 1988.

This bill will provide eligibility for service-connected disability compensation, Dependency Indemnity Compensation, hospital and medical care, burial and memorial benefits, and survivors' educational assistance. It does not provide readjustment benefits like VA home loans, GI bill educational assistance, or vocational rehabilitation as most of these guardsmen and reservists are more than 65 years old.

To me, these benefits are a matter of equity. During the debate on the Radiation-Exposed Veterans Compensation Act, these men were inadvertently omitted from coverage. Every man that served during these experiments was equally exposed to radiation and is now equally deserving of fair treatment. It is my hope that this legislation will guarantee that all medical expenses will be covered by the U.S. Government.

As a member of the Alabama National Guard, I am pleased to cosponsor this bill to provide benefits for this special group of guardsmen and reservists. I am also pleased that survivors will be granted both compensation and educational assistance.

More than 30 of my colleagues have already agreed to be original cosponsors of the legislation. As a member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, I feel sure that the bill will be considered in the near future.

AMERICAN WETLANDS ACT OF 1990

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ANTHONY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, 3 years ago, a young farmer and his father came into my office, laid some maps down on my desk and said they thought they had a wetlands problem. That particular problem was related to the swampbuster provisions of the 1985 Farm Act. Since that time, the scope of wetlands regulation has expanded far beyond the reach of swampbuster and for the first time, farmers and other landowners are being required to apply for a 404 permit from the Corps of Engineers in order to engage in activities that they and their ancestors have been doing for generations as normal practices.

We all know, however, that wetlands regulation goes far beyond the realm of farming. Every day, developers are purchasing land with certain industrial, housing, or economic goals in mind only to find out later that the land is subject to 404 and totally worthless for the purposes intended. The investment is wiped out and the landowner may even be subject to substantial costs of remediation or penalties.

Although wetlands regulation has provided some harsh results, we can't ignore our responsibility to preserve the resource. In many ways it is ironic that for most of our Nation's history, draining swamps and wet areas was a worthwhile civic endeavor seen to be in the interest of public health and safety and necessary for proper economic growth. Today, however, the same spirit of righteousness that once said "drain the swamps," is now crying for their restoration.

Ironic, perhaps, but it does underscore our ever growing understanding and appreciation for the environment. It is, perhaps, an ominous warning to us that practices we today take for granted may in the future be seen as environmentally irresponsible. Regardless of past policy, our attention today must focus on what steps are necessary to protect a valuable natural resource in such a manner that does not totally disrupt our current economic and social structure. We must never lose sight that an overzealous quest for environmental purity may choke to death the economic lifeblood of the civilization that supports the quest.

Last year, I formed a Special Arkansas Task Force on Wetlands that consisted of a broad cross section of interests ranging from agriculture to wildlife preservation and from industrial development and transportation to State and local governmental entities. Although the nature of the issue is one that does not lend itself to a solution that will be embraced 100 percent by all interested parties, I do feel that the input and suggestions from the Arkansas-based group did much to help me shape a total program that touches on the key interests expressed by those task force members. I would like to publicly thank the members of the Arkansas task force for their help and their expertise in this issue.

I am today introducing, along with some of my colleagues, a comprehensive package that I believe will bring some sense of reason to the wetlands regulatory process. My bill does not scrap the work that has been done in the area of wetlands regulation, it builds on the foundation already established with a focus on the wetland values most worthy of this Congress' attention.

First of all, my bill embraces the basic definition of wetlands currently used in the administration of swampbuster and section 404. Once defined, however, all wetlands will fall into four categories: prior converted wetlands—which are exempt from all regulation—nonconverted wetlands—which are subject to a certain degree of regulation—special nonconverted wetlands—which are wetlands currently in economic use but which retain valuable wetland values—and natural wetlands. The higher the value of the wetlands resource, the higher the level of regulatory protection.

As pointed out above, the wetlands issue is not just a farming issue. Wetlands regulation affects all economic activity. Because I feel it necessary for landowners—current or prospective—to have adequate notice of any regulation which attaches to their property, my bill instructs the U.S. Soil Conservation Service to continue their ongoing inventory of wetlands and expand the inventory to include all lands. In addition, the inventory shall describe those wetlands which contain special wetland values.

My legislation provides for determinations of five basic wetland values: water quality—determined by EPA as delegated to the States through section 401 of the Clean Water Act; sedimentation discharge—determined by SCS; wildlife habitat determined by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service; aquifer recharge—determined by the U.S. Geological Survey; and flood control—determined by the Corps of Engineers for large watersheds and SCS for small watersheds.

Each agency charged with making special value determinations will first have to publish a proposed rule in the Federal Register that will outline the process by which the value determinations will be made. I do not intend for my legislation to become a license for various agencies to run amok at the expense of private landowners. I do demand that they be upfront and explain at the front end—not through a manual issued years later—what test they will use so that landowners can gage actual determinations against an established test.

Likewise, I do not intend my legislation to be carte blanche to label everything a special value. For example, in a technical sense, it would be possible for the Fish and Wildlife Service to find wildlife habitat in any area, wetland or not. My bill, however, limits the finding of special wildlife habitat to that which is unique or unusual as a guarantee that truly special values are forever preserved without making every inch of the country regulated as a wildlife refuge. On the other hand, certain areas, such as prairie potholes, that are extremely valuable for perpetuation of our waterfowl species, must be preserved because too much is otherwise at risk.

Regulation based solely on use prohibitions and penalties is insufficient to properly protect, preserve, and restore our Nation's wetland resources. My bill includes a number of provisions that serve as positive incentives for landowners to engage in sound conservation practices.

Among my proposals for wetland preservation and restoration include a new program called the Conservation Conveyance Program. This program, similar to our current Conservation Reserve Program, allows the Secretary of Interior to accept bids for the purchase of fee title or permanent easement of lands with valuable wetland qualities. This provides the landowner a direct incentive to voluntarily place lands in a perpetual state of preservation.

My bill also amends the Internal Revenue Code in such a way that provides an incentive to reclaim and restore wetlands, or to actually donate them to governmental units or certain designated groups. For farmland owners, my bill encourages the restoration of wetlands as a method of gaining eligibility to USDA programs in such a way that is without cost to the Government.

When wetlands must be converted, and if we expect to continue growth in this country we must recognize that some wetlands will have to be converted, my bill assures that our policy of overall no net loss of wetlands focuses of the very values that make them valuable to us. Under my legislation, lands subject to swampbuster can be converted, but only as long as all special values are protected.

It is time we brought reason to the area of wetlands regulation to make preservation a practical and realistic goal. A simple definition in a manual may make easy reading, but it may also make terrible policy. It is time we focus on quality, not just quantity. It is time that we make penalties—such as those related to swampbuster—more in line with the nature of the violation so that local enforcers don't have to fear that reporting a small violation will place a family farm in bankruptcy. It is time we establish an administrative appeals process for all wetland determinations in order to make the agencies more responsive to regulatory impact on property values. It is time to stop telling rice farmers that putting rice levees on their farm is not a normal farming practice. It is time we come together and work on a solution rather than deciding who gets the blame.

A member of my task force from Arkansas very eloquently expressed the sentiment that I tried to capture in my legislation. He said:

Farmers and landowners do not want to destroy wetlands, they want them preserved like everyone else. However, since the benefit that accrues from wetland preservation is that of society in general, the total cost of preservation should not be borne solely by those who are subject to prohibitory regulation.

I believe my legislation places the responsibility of the landowner in a perspective that is reasonable. I also believe that a proper balance between landowner rights and resource conservation has been struck. Through my incentives for preservation and restoration, and through my process of mitigation, there will be an overall net increase in wetlands and special wetland values.

The value of wetlands regulation is one that touches every state in this country. I urge all my colleagues to join with me to correct abuses of the past and to preserve our resources for the future.

INTRODUCTION OF BILL TO IMPOSE AN EXCISE TAX UPON AMOUNTS RECEIVED IN CONNECTION WITH CERTAIN COMBINATIONS OF PARTNERSHIPS WHERE DISSENTING EQUITY HOLDERS DO NOT HAVE APPRAISAL RIGHTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce a bill which imposes an excise tax on amounts received in connection with certain combinations of partnerships and real estate investment trusts, commonly known as roll-ups, where dissenting equity holders to not have appraisal rights in the transaction.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a recent trend on the part of partnership promoters and managers, particularly in publicly held real estate partnerships, to combine several partnerships into one publicly traded partnership. Investors are lured into trading their partnership interests for equity shares in the large publicly traded partnership on expectations of increased liquidity since such interests can be traded on an exchange. Unfortunately, many of these roll-up transactions have seriously reduced the value of the limited investors' interests.

For example, in one recent case, the value of investors' interests in the new publicly traded limited partnership were immediately reduced by 70 percent from the pre-roll-up appraised value, and 2 years after the roll-up the reduction had increased to almost 90 percent of the pre-roll-up appraised value. There are several reasons for the drastic reduction in value in this and similar cases. First, fees of general partners increase dramatically as the result of most roll-ups, and promoters, general partners, and investment advisers all obtain significant fees from these transactions at the expense of the limited investors. Second, economically sound enterprises are often combined with partnerships with serious operating difficulties in a roll-up. This combination assists the promoters and general partners in keeping weak properties in troubled partnerships from foreclosure, but seriously harms the investors in financially sound funds. Third, the general partner will, in some cases, accelerate residual interests in the partnership which otherwise would not be allowed until the liquidation of the partnership. Such acceleration further dilutes the interests of the limited investor in the ongoing enterprise.

Mr. Speaker, this situation cannot be tolerated. Unlike a tender offer in a corporate acquisition, limited partners in these partnerships do not have the practical ability to sell their interests at a fair price instead of reinvesting in the new partnership. Although limited partners are afforded a simple majority vote on the transaction, unlike a normal proxy solicitation, there is no opposing side or sophisticated analysts calling attention to potential abuses in a transaction. In these cases an investor typically receives a massive proxy document with a cover letter from the general partner reciting the advantages of the transaction. The ability of the limited partner to obtain a balanced assessment of the transaction is further reduced since in many cases, because there is no organized opposition to the transaction, the investor's broker will be compensated only if the limited investor votes to affirm the transaction.

The bill I introduce today would require a limited investor in a rollup transaction to receive dissenters' rights to redeem his or her equity interest in the entity for an amount in cash equal to the interest's proportionate share of the net value of the assets of the entity immediately prior to the rollup transaction. In this way, an investor may make a fair decision whether to join the new enterprise or liquidate the investment. If limited investors are not afforded this protection, then in general any amounts, gain, payments, fees, or other consideration resulting from such transaction and the resulting entity by the general partner, manager, investment adviser, broker, promoter, investment banker, underwriter, appraiser, or related entity would be subject to an excise tax equal to 50 percent of such gain or consideration. Because real estate rollup transactions may occur in limited partnerships as well as in real estate investment trusts, both entities are subject to the provisions of my bill, as well as consolidation of such entities into a corporation. The bill defines a rollup transaction as any acquisition or merger, if in connection with the transaction an offering is required to be filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission. I have attached to my statement a technical explanation of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I am confident that the bill I introduce today will stop this abuse of investors. An investor should have a real choice whether to continue an investment in a changed entity or to liquidate the investment for fair value. An investor should not have the value of interests significantly and permanently reduced with no practical way out of the investment. I believe this abuse should be stopped immediately; accordingly, the bill is effective for rollup transactions occuring after April 26, 1990.

TECHNICAL EXPLANATION OF THE BILL

PRESENT LAW

Under present law, partnerships or real estate investment trusts (REITs) may combine to form other partnerships or REITs. Federal tax law does not impose sanctions in the event that persons with interests in such entities are not offered rights to dissent to such transactions and receive cash for their interests.

EXPLANATION OF PROVISION

The bill would impose an excise tax (in addition to all other taxes) on certain payments relating to prohibited rollup transactions. The amount of the excise tax is 50 percent of any gain or other income (whether or not recognized) of the disqualified person who receives a disqualified rollup-related payment, by reason of such receipt.

Under the bill, a prohibited rollup transaction means any acquisition of interests in or assets of a partnership or REIT by a partnership or corporation, or any merger or combination of partnerships or REITs into a partnership or corporation, that meets the following two criteria.

The tax is imposed in the case of these transactions, if in connection with the transaction, (1) there is an offering required to be registered with the Securities and Exchange Commission, and (2) dissenters' rights are not provided by each partnership or REIT that is a party to the transaction and that was in existence before the transaction.

The dissenters' rights required to avoid the excise tax under the bill must provide that each person with an equity interest (1) has a reasonable opportunity to dissent to the transaction, and (2) has the right to require the redemption of his equity interest for an amount in cash equal to his proportionate share of the net value of the assets of the entity immediately before the transaction. For this purpose, the net asset value is considered as not less than the amount represented (in documents filed with the SEC) to be the value of the consideration received in the transaction in exchange for his equity interest.

A disqualified person subject to the 50 percent excise tax on disqualified rollup-related payments means a general partner, manager, investment advisor to a party to the transaction, or any person performing services as a broker, dealer, underwriter, promoter, investment banker or appraiser in connection with the transaction, or any person related to any of them.

Under the bill, a disqualified rollup-related payment is any payment, fee or other consideration received by a disqualified person on account of services rendered in connection with the transaction, and any consideration received in the transaction in exchange for any interest in a partnership or REIT (or for the relinquishment of any right under a contract with any such entity). In addition, a disqualified rollup-related payment includes any payment, fee or other consideration (1) received on account of services rendered to the entity resulting from the transaction, or (2) received on account of holding any interest in an entity that is a party to the transaction (including any amount received in redemption or other disposition of the interest). Under the bill, if a disqualified person performs services in connection with the transaction or for the entity resulting from the transaction, then a disqualified rollup-related payment is considered to include any consideration received, including, for example, stock or debt of a corporation, or an option to acquire property, whether or not at a bargain price. The consideration subject to the provision includes not only the value of the option upon receipt, but also the amount treated as gain on exercise of the option. Consideration received by a disqualified person who performs such services is presumed to be subject to the provision regardless of whether the person may have also sold property to a partnership, REIT or other corporation that is a party to the transaction.

The bill would be effective with respect to prohibited rollup transactions occurring after April 26, 1990.

FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE NUCLEAR ACCIDENT AT CHERNOBYL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to commemorate the fourth anniversary of the nuclear accident at Chernobyl, and to use this opportunity to urge the Soviet Union to provide urgently needed medical assistance to the victims of this accident. Also, it is critically important for the Soviets to immediately close the reactors still in operation on this site, as well as institute procedures and standards which are internationally recognized for the safe construction and operation of nuclear facilities.

The people of Byelarussia and the Ukraine were especially hard hit by this disaster. Because of the lack of medication and medical care, thousands of men, women, and children remain ill, and are expected to die from radiation exposure. Also, today, millions of people are living in regions with extremely high levels of radiation.

At first, the Soviet Union concealed this accident, and then, ignored its devastating consequences. Also, the full extent of this environmental and human catastrophe has yet to be completely disclosed for world scrutiny. Although recently the Soviets reluctantly approved some funding for the relocation and resettlement of individuals from areas contaminated by radiation, a much deeper commitment from the Soviets is required.

Mr. Speaker, on this fourth anniversary of this tragic accident, I call on the Soviet Union to release all information on the full extent of this environmental disaster, to take steps immediately to close the remaining reactors operating on the Chernobyl site, and to provide critically needed medical assistance to those who have been and continue to be exposed to dangerously high levels of radiation.

APPOINTMENT OF MARILYN LLOYD IN TENNESSEE MILITIA

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I want to share with you an event that took place on March 24, 1990, concerning our colleague, MARILYN LLOYD, Third District of Tennessee. Due to her interests and concerns for the Tennessee National Guard, she has been appointed an honorary major general in the Tennessee Militia by the adjutant general of Tennessee, Maj. Gen. Carl Wallace. I know that this honor is justly deserved as exemplified by the attached certificate. I extend my congratulations to my friend and colleague, MARILYN LLOYD.

TENNESSEE MILITIA

To all who shall see these presents, greeting: Know Ye, that reposing special trust and confidence in the patriotism, valor, fidelity and abilities of The Honorable Marilyn Lloyd I do appoint an honorary Major General in the Tennessee Militia to rank as such from the 24th day of March, nineteen hundred and Ninety. This officer will therefore carefully and diligently discharge the duties of the office to which appointed by doing and performing all manner of things thereunto belonging. All Officers, Warrant Officers, Noncommissioned Officers, and Soldiers of lessor rank are strictly charged and required to be obedient as is due an Officer of this grade and position. And this officer is to observe and follow such orders and directions, from time to time, as may be given by this, the Governor of the State of Tennessee, or other Superior Officer, acting in accordance with the rules and disciplines of War, and the laws of the State of Tennessee.

Done at the City of Nashville, this 24th day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and Ninety.

PIECING TOGETHER THE ASAT PUZZLE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. BROWN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to discuss the issue of antisatellite [Asat] weapons. In this year's budget request, the Administration is asking for a 180-percent increase in funding for the development of a new ground-launched Asat system. Despite the revolutionary changes that have taken place in East-West relations over the past year, the Department of Defense seems eager to enter into a new round of arms competition with the Soviet Union, a competition in weapons designed to destroy satellites.

At this juncture in history, the United States should be extremely deliberate in its decisionmaking about new weapons systems. Last year the U.S. Congress provided a mechanism for the administration to engage in some new thinking about the Asat issue, by mandating a comprehensive report on U.S. Asat arms control policy. That report, due May 1, will be the first major review of this issue since March 1984, when the Reagan administration submitted a report to Congress on U.S. Asat policy. Much has changed in the world since March 1984, and I sincerely hope that the Bush administration is taking these changes into account as it prepares its report.

The question of whether or not the United States should deploy an Asat system was one of the most contentious defense issues of the 1980's. Whether it will spark similar controversy during the 1990's remains to be seen, although I suspect that it will since the opposing camps on this issue seem about as far apart as ever. The purpose of my remarks today is to see if its possible to bridge some of the distance between those who support and those who oppose Asat deployment, in an attempt to reach a policy that both sides can live with.

To those in the administration working on the report due to Congress next week, I hope you are listening, for if the document you are preparing is little more than a regurgitation of the last administration's position on this issue, then I can guarantee that your study will be greeted with intense criticism.

ASAT DEBATE HISTORY

In many ways, the "Great Asat Debate" can be viewed as a case study of how opposing parties to a controversy take the same basic information and combine it to reach entirely different conclusions. A useful analogy is that of a jig-saw puzzle, with each piece representing a different aspect of the Asat issue. In the case of Asat proponents, existing Soviet Asat capabilities, United States reliance on satellites as force multipliers, and scenarios for conflict between the two superpowers piece together into an ominous image of United States deficiencies and the need for urgent Asat deployments.

For those opposed to Asats, these same pieces assemble into an entirely different picture, one of potentially disastrous consequences for U.S. national security if Asats are left unconstrained.

As I have observed and participated in the "Great Asat Debate" of the past decade, it has become clear to me that neither side of this controversy has come up with a picture that is either entirely complete or fully accurate. Both sides have tended to exaggerate their case in accordance with their own particular biases, institutional allegiances, and ideological predilections.

In many ways, the deficiencies in the arguments used in this controversy were unavoidable, given the context in which they were initially presented and subsequently repeated. The early years of the Reagan administration was a polarizing period, forcing otherwise sensible people to seek out extremes that they might otherwise not have adhered to.

The specific focus of the Asat debate during the 1980's was the Air Force's miniature homing vehicle [MHV] program. The MHV was initiated in 1977, and by 1983—at the height of the Reagan defense build-up—the program was requesting funds for both tests in space and for advanced procurement. The administration was stalling arms control discussions with the Soviets on all fronts, giving the impression that it felt United States national security was best achieved through unilateral pursuit of military superiority in all realms. In many ways, Asat became a lightning rod for congressional concerns not only about the implications of unconstrained United States and Soviet Asat deployments, but also about much, much more.

The MHV assumed symbolic significance above and beyond the issues that were germane to the weapon itself. This was especially true in the wake of President Reagan's March 1983 speech which lead to the creation of the strategic defense initiative. For those in support of the SDI, the MHV represented a foot in the door for more extensive space weapon deployments. For those opposed to SDI, the MHV was seen in the same light, and thus was a foot that needed to be blocked before it went anywhere.

The hand of Asat opponents was strengthened considerably by the technical deficiencies and cost overruns of the MHV system itself. By 1986, a program that initially was to cost a mere $500 million had a new price tag of $5.3 billion. In a cost-cutting move in 1987, the Air Force scaled the program back by two-thirds, thus curbing the system's capabilities even further. With the additional burden of a 3-year congressional prohibition on tests against objects in space, the program's termination was a fait accompli.

It has now been more than 2 years since the MHV was canceled, and much has changed in the world. We have a new administration, a new climate in East-West relations, new defense budget realities—including a diminished prospect for SDI deployments in space—and we have a new ASAT program. In light of these changes, it seems sensible for all parties involved in the ASAT debate to step back and take a fresh new look at both the current world situation and their own positions on the issue. I would like to believe that through such a process a consensus could be reached that would enable us to avoid such a protracted conflict this time around.

To those who have felt that an ASAT is one of the Nation's most serious military deficiencies, let me be quite candid for a few moments about the arguments that you have used to build your case. I will give a similar critique of arguments used by those opposed to Asat deployments.

CRITIQUE OF ASAT PROPONENTS

In a nutshell, Asat proponents have come to Congress each year arguing that the United States needs an ASAT for two principal reasons: First, in order to deter use of the Soviet Union's Asat, and second, so that in the event that deterrence fails, the United States can destroy Soviet satellites that directly threaten our military forces.

Let me start with some comments on the portrayals made of current Soviet Asat capabilities. I feel that any objective observer would conclude that the threat posed by the Soviet Union's coorbital Asat has been blown way out of proportion in recent years. Indeed, it seems that the longer the system goes untested, the more threatening it becomes.

Eight years ago the Soviet coorbital Asat was assessed in the following ways:

Leslie Dirks, then vice president of the Raytheon Corp., and former Director for Research and Technology at the CIA, said:

> The latest information I've had is the [the Soviet Asat] doesn't work. Anyone who has followed it closely would have to agree.

Gen. Lew Allen, then U.S. Air Force Chief of Staff, said:

> Our general opinion is that we give it a very questionable operational capability for a few launches * * * They have not had a test program that would cause us to believe it is a very credible threat.

In the time since these statements were made, the Soviets have abided by an 8-year-long test moratorium on their Asat. The simple truth is that the capability of the system cannot be getting better over time as a result of no testing, although you would think that it could in reading some of the congressional testimony delivered on this issue over the last few years.

The fact that the Soviets continue to test the SL-11 booster associated with the coorbital Asat is interesting, but is far less significant than it's made out to be. The success or failure of a kinetic kill Asat—such as the Soviets have—rests on the proficiency of the system's homing device, and the Soviets have not tested those sensors in a full-up test since June 1982. This means that they are left with the same radar homing technology that was introduced with the system when it was first tested more than 20 years ago. All attempts to develop a more sophisticated optical seeker failed in the late 1970's and early 1980's.

For a balanced assessment of the Soviet Asat, I recommend a 1987 paper coauthored by Gen. Brent Scowcroft, William Perry, Joseph Nye, and James Schear. In their chapter of a book called Seeking Stability in Space, they state that the "significance" of the Soviet Asat "should not be exaggerated," since it is "a very crude system" which would require "two weeks or more" to destroy "any substantial number" of U.S. satellites, and its radar guidance and slow pace of attack would give its targets "opportunities for evasive action."

Scowcroft and his coauthors also had some edifying words on other Soviet Asat capabilities, which I think Asat proponents should concede in their statements on this issue. In terms of the residual Asat threat posed by Galosh AMB interceptors based around Moscow, they note that the use of these nuclear-tipped systems against satellite targets "is scarcely believable in any scenario except nuclear conflict." If used in an Asat mode, the nuclear bursts from Galosh interceptors would damage Soviet satellites in addition to United States targets.

Congressional testimony in support of developing a United States Asat never mentions these clear deficiencies in Soviet Asat capabilities. The timeframe of 2 weeks or more that it would now take for the Soviets to attack any substantial number of our satellites could be reduced to several hours or minutes, but we clearly are not at that point today. This brings me to another deficiency in the case presented by Asat advocates: We never hear any discussion of the implications for United States security if the Soviet Union does acquire a sky-sweeping Asat capability at all altitudes.

If the many pieces of the Asat puzzle could be assembled into a final picture in which the United States had a robust and effective Asat capability while the Soviet Union had none, then there would be little controversy on this subject. Indeed, there would be an overwhelming consensus to move ahead and deploy those Asats. Such an outcome is extremely unrealistic, however, and should not serve as the basis of U.S. decisionmaking. Prudent military planning must recognize that the Soviet Union could field an Asat system comparable to any sought by the United States, if only a few years later.

In fact, experience over the past 40 years shows that the Soviets have sought such equivalence in every aspect of military systems, from strategic missile forces to fighter and bomber aircraft, submarines and aircraft carriers. Each side has perceived any effort by the other side to achieve a pronounced advantage in a weapons system as a destabilizing effort, in some cases as an effort to achieve a first-strike capability, and has therefore redoubled its efforts to reverse the situation.

The goal of the Army's current Asat program is to develop the ability to attack a high number of Soviet satellites in a short period of time. Such a capability would enable the United States to degrade the Soviet Union's use of satellites during a military conflict. However, conferring on the Soviets a similar sky-sweeping Asat capability would greatly undermine our own use of military space systems.

The United States and Soviet space infrastructures are substantially different, with the Soviets commonly launching more than 100 satellites annually while the United States launches 20 or less. During the Falklands War, for example, the Soviet Union conducted 29 launches in 69 days. This is more launches in 2 months than the U.S. has achieved in 3 years. Because our launch infrastructure is so much less responsive and flexible than the Soviets, we would be at a substantial disadvantage in the event of an Asat shooting war. Indeed, the argument that the Soviet Union would be deterred from using its Asats in the face of a United States Asat capability really starts falling apart if the Soviets can replace their satellites and we cannot, while we are the ones that are more dependent on the satellites.

Three concerns emerge at this point that have not received any real discussion or analysis in the presentations made on Capitol Hill in support of Asat deployments.

First, are we prepared to lose our satellites in low Earth orbit in order to simply interrupt the Soviet Union's use of satellites in low Earth orbit? As a point of reference here, let me quote Ambassador Paul Wolfowitz, Under Secretary of Defense for Policy, who told the Senate Armed Services Committee last year that, "We would be in very deep trouble if we lost everything that is in low Earth orbit."

One can appreciate this assessment very well by considering the impact of last month's failure of our latest and most sophisticated overhead reconnaissance satellite, and then postulating the erosion of our military capabilities that would occur if we lost every other U.S. satellite in low Earth orbit. Since the most likely scenario for using Asats is just prior to an expected nuclear exchange, and during the ensuring nuclear war, generally assumed to be brief, our inability to rapidly replace important assets is a substantial deficiency.

Second, if Asats against satellites in low Earth orbit are left unconstrained, what confidence will we have in the survivability of our early warning and communications satellites in geosynchronous orbit? In other words, is our desire to shoot down Soviet satellites in low Earth orbit so strong that we are prepared to strongly encourage the Soviet Union to develop a new generation of Asats that could be upgraded to threaten United States satellites at all altitudes? With the new lightweight kill vehicles now being developed, which the Soviet Union could probably achieve a few years after we do, it becomes plausible to take an Asat that has been tested against satellites in low Earth orbit and mount them on larger boosters in order to pose a threat to high orbit satellites. As a point of reference here, let me refer again to the piece coauthored by General Scowcroft, which states: "Our interests weigh heavily in favor of suppressing all development of Asat capability at high altitudes." The four authors argue that "we have a considerable stake in staving off risks to communications and early warning satellites that afford both sides a critical margin of time to act—and react—rationally during crisis."

And third, if the United States does deploy an Asat capability, do we have realistic scenarios in which the use of these weapons does not make the conflict worse? Once again I will pull from a page by General Scowcroft and company, where it is written that "all scenarios involving the use of Asats, especially those surrounding crises, increase the risks of accident, misperception, and inadvertent escalation."

Let me touch on one last point before moving on to critique some of the arguments used in opposition to Asats. Specifically, let's look for a moment at the threat posed by Soviet Rorsat and Eorsat satellites.

The impression that many people walk away with when hearing arguments made in support of Asat deployments is that current Soviet satellites represent a unique tracking and targeting threat against United States naval forces for which there is no defense except shooting those satellites down. Anyone in the U.S. Navy could tell you that this isn't exactly accurate.

Our ships at sea have a whole host of nondestructive countermeasures that can be used to jam, evade, and confuse Soviet spacecraft. These nondestructive countermeasures are routinely tested in naval exercises, and they work. For example, Vice Admiral Hary Mustin, commander of the Ocean Safari exercise in 1985, reported that his battle group "disappeared from the face of the Earth, as far as the Soviets were concerned," and reappeared on the other side of the Atlantic. "I can tell you," he said, "they were going bananas trying to find us."

When asked last year about the threat posed by Rorsats and Eorsats, Adm. Huntington Hardisty, commander-in-chief of the U.S. Pacific Command, told Congress:

> We continue to feel that the rate at which we gain fleet experience and capabilities against these Soviet systems probably exceeds their capability to provide surveillance information against our tactical fleet assets.

It's really the future threat that is driving the calculations in support of a U.S. Asat, yet this fact doesn't come across in most of the statements made on Capitol Hill in support of Asat deployment. Nor is it explained that the Soviet Union tracks United States naval forces with a wide range of systems, including aircraft, ships, submarines and ground stations. I might note, however, that the annual testimony for the past 3 years from the Director of Naval Intelligence—testimony which runs between 50 and 75 single-space pages—has never mentioned Rorsat and Eorsat in alarming terms.

CRITIQUE OF ASAT OPPONENTS

Now, let me turn the tables for a moment. In making their case against Asat deployments, Asat critics argue that the Soviet Union's Asat capability is so crude and ineffective that it is essentially useless, that Asat deployments would be extremely destabilizing, and thus we should move promptly to negotiate a treaty with the Soviets which places strict limits on Asat systems. There are some clear deficiencies in these basic arguments.

Just as I said earlier that the threat posed by the Soviet Union's coorbital Asat should not be overstated, so, too, that threat should not be understated. The Soviet Union does have an Asat. It has been tested 20 times since 1968, it appears to be maintained in an operational status, and thus in the event of a conflict with the United States, there seems little doubt that the Soviets would consider using the weapon against United States satellites.

In a similar vein, Soviet high-energy laser and electronic warfare technologies should not be casually dismissed as having no Asat potential. Although such approaches appear to need considerably more development before they represented serious Asat threats, such developments could take place during the years ahead. The Soviet Union has been working aggressively on directed energy research. Some of this activity was viewed firsthand last summer by a congressional delegation that visited the Sary Shagan testing facility. Other laser facilities at Sary Shagan, and elsewhere, were not visited and do represent research efforts of potential concern to the United States.

Asat opponents tend to minimize the potential threat from existing Soviet satellite and Asat systems, while focusing simply on the threat to United States satellites if Soviet Asat deployments are left unconstrained. The truth is that certain military satellites could be just as destabilizing as Asat's. The threat posed by Soviet spacecraft could very well increase in years to come. For example, what if the Soviet Union launched an advanced surveillance system capable of detecting, tracking, and therefore targeting mobile ICBM's, which both nations would rely on to ensure retaliation? Such satellites could help coordinate a first strike nuclear attack and thus would be an overpowering stimulus for Asat deployment. Similarly, if the Soviet Union launched into space a laser weapon or other device with a direct attack capability, would Asat opponents concede the need for an Asat capability?

On the issue of negotiating an Asat limitation treaty with the Soviets, Asat critics also leave some unanswered questions. Specifically, what precise verification measures are envisioned to ensure that the Soviet Union doesn't covertly develop an Asat capability? More specifically, how can these verification provisions be structured to ensure extremely high confidence in monitoring Soviet activities in the military space arena while also guarding sensitive components of the United States military space program against Soviet espionage?

One final observation has to do with the complementary actions associated with any attempt to enhance the survivability of U.S. military satellites. The question arises as to whether Asat opponents will show as much enthusiasm to invest in both satellite survivability measures and an expanded and streamlined launch capability as they have shown to divest from U.S. Asat Programs. Developing and maintaining a military space structure that is secure against the threat posed by residual Soviet Asat's, and which has the responsiveness and flexibility to replace lost assets during a time of conflict, will not be an inexpensive proposition. Yet, if the goal of Asat opponents is to constrain the threat posed to U.S. military satellites in ways other than through Asat deployments, then there is no excuse not to support aggressive satellite survivability measures and additional launch capabilities.

TEN PRINCIPLES FOR AGREEMENT

Having worked my way through some of the major arguments that have been aired from opposing sides of the Asat debate, let me now present a list of 10 principles that I would like to think both sides could agree upon.

First, the current threats from Soviet satellite and antisatellite systems are modest, yet could increase substantially.

Second, dismantlement of the Soviet Union's coorbital Asat would reduce the current threat posed to United States military satellites.

Third, changes underway in the Soviet Union could result in cutbacks in the Soviet space program, which might reduce the threat from Soviet military space activities. It may take several years, however, before we have a clear indication of such changes.

Fourth, in the face of this uncertainty, it is prudent for the United States to continue Asat research and development with an eye toward maintaining an ultimate option to deploy.

Fifth, a United States Asat capability alone would be a poor deterrent to Soviet Asat use unless or until the Nation substantially improved the survivability of its satellites and greatly enhanced its launch responsiveness.

Sixth, if either nation dramatically increased its real-time targeting capability from space, or deployed weapons in space, Asat deployments could become unavoidable.

Seventh, it would be far more difficult to roll back Asat capabilities after they are fully developed and deployed than it would be at the current time, when effective, dedicated Asat's are still under development.

Eighth, once an Asat competition begins, the United States will find it increasingly difficult to ensure protection of its satellites, despite ever more elaborate and costly countermeasures.

Ninth, it is not possible to achieve a complete ban on Asat's since a number of weapons have inherent Asat applications. However, these residual Asat's represent a substantially lower or less credible threat than from dedicated Asat systems.

Tenth, the monitoring capabilities needed to ensure verification of an Asat limitation agreement are not all currently in hand, and thus require further examination, investment, and demonstration.

SETTING A NATIONAL POLICY

These 10 principles—puzzle pieces if you will—can be assembled into a policy characterized in the following way:

The United States should preserve an option to deploy an Asat in the late 1990's if the two superpowers fail to reach agreement on limitations for both military space activities and Asat activities. The two nations should move promptly to begin Asat negotiations, with an early focus being dismantlement of the Soviet Union's coorbital Asat in exchange for destruction of the five United States Asat's left over from the cancelled MHV Asat Program. These five MHV's are kept in a storage bunker at LTV in Dallas, TX, at a cost of $5,000 per month.

As an aside, let me share a discussion I had not too long ago with Tony Battista, former staff director of the House Armed Services Committee. Tony was in my office and we got to talking about the Soviet Asat Program, at which point he told me that during his 1987 visit to the Krasnoyarsk radar station, he asked the Soviets what they would offer the United States if we scrapped the MHV program. Specifically, he asked if the Soviets would take their existing 24 or so coorbital Asat interceptors out into a field and destroy them under United States supervision. The initial response from the Soviets sitting across the table was that they didn't have 24 Asat's, or whatever the number was that Tony said, but that they only had 16. Tony responded, "We can let our intelligence folks settle on the exact number, but would you take them out into a field and destroy them." The Soviets said they would. There have been other indications of Soviet willingness to scrap their Asat if the conditions were right. The time has come for the United States to press this proposal to see if it's real.

I should note here that there appears to be no discrepancy between United States and Soviet figures on the number of Soviet coorbital Asat vehicles. The unclassified report of Admiral Crowe's testimony before the Senate Appropriations Committee last year states that the Soviets have 16 coorbital vehicles. It should be recalled that during the INF negotiations the issue of how many intermediate-range missiles the Soviets had was a point of major controversy, yet the two sides did reach agreement on the dismantlement of those systems.

The time has also come for the two superpowers to begin fundamental discussions of the military activities in space, not simply focused on Asat or missile defense technologies, but also on the topic of surveillance activities from space. General Piotrowski, for example, testified last month before the Senate Armed Services Committee in support of a space-based wide-area surveillance system which, according to his estimates would represent "a United States investment of less than $10 billion [that] would result in a system capable of effectively tracking over $400 billion of Soviet and other potential adversaries' air and naval assets." While this may sound tantalizing, we need to think what it might mean if the Soviet Union acquires a similar space surveillance capability. Such a system would represent an overwhelming stimulus of Asat deployments, which would call into question all United States and Soviet space support systems during a period of conflict.

While the superpowers explore the prospects for negotiated limitations on Asat systems, they should agree to a 5-year ban on testing Asat's against targets in space. Since the Army's current Asat Program does not envision tests against objects in space until 1994, such a test ban would introduce only a short delay in the current schedule.

During this 5-year period, the United States should invest considerable funds in enhancing the survivability of its satellite systems; expanding U.S. launch capabilities and turnaround times; improving the Space Surveillance Network; and fully explore new verification techniques which could provide high confidence in detecting covert Asat activities.

One such verification technique involves the development of in-country ground-based monitoring devices that would detect the light reflected off of atmospheric aerosols during tests of high-power ground-based lasers. A group of scientists associated with Argonne, Los Alamos, and Livermore National Laboratory have found this to be a promising technique. One of the groups, for example, says that "our preliminary analysis suggests that it is feasible to build a laser monitor which detects all optical and infrared lasers, with sensitivity sufficient to verify weapon-level laser power and energy at long range by direct line-of-sight scattering from the air or the target and probably also at very long range by over-the-horizon scattering." The Congress appropriated $2 million to explore this concept during the current fiscal year, and will be providing more for next year.

With in-country monitoring devices such as this, site visits such as are becoming almost routine in United States-Soviet relations, and onsite human verification provisions like those included in the Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces Treaty, the verification task for Asat is likely to be far more manageable than it was thought to be a few years ago.

The policy I've described here involves preparation for both Asat deployments if the threat from space escalates considerably during the 1990's and strict Asat limitations if the superpowers can negotiate a reasonable agreement. Since space capabilities are not static, any Asat Treaty that is reached should be in the form of a 5-year renewable document with a withdrawal clause to protect us in the event of a substantial change in the Soviet military space force.

Such a policy would make sure that an Asat competition is not initiated prematurely, thus leading to an escalation of the threat to U.S. satellites, without us having first fully explored the options for a negotiated solution to the Asat problem. In addition, this policy would help avoid a fractious and polarizing debate on Asat's during the 1990's that could leave the United States without either an Asat or an Asat limitation regime. Finally, it seeks to build a constituency for the satellite survivability and launch responsiveness improvements that will be needed regardless of whether we strictly limit or proceed to deploy Asat's.

I, for one, can foresee the day when Asat's of sufficient capability could force both nations to largely abandon their reliance on space. This would happen after both sides spent untold billions to perfect the threat posed by their satellites against the military forces of the other nation, to develop Asat's capable of negating those satellites, and then to develop ground-based alternatives to the systems in space that have become threatened by prompt attack at the outset of a conflict.

The nature of the Soviet threat is evolving sufficiently that we should not rush to prejudge what it will be 5 or 10 years from now. Indeed, there are strong reasons to believe that Soviet military systems that we have thought might be deployed during the 1990's may never emerge. Because of the uncertainties, however, we do need to maintain our options. The policy I have described fits those goals, while striking a reasonable balance between opposing perspectives on the Asat issue, viewed in all its complexity.

Mr. Speaker, now is not the time for further platitudes on the Asat issue. Rather, it is a time to forge a coherent national policy. It is in that spirit that my remarks are offered today. I hope administration officials are listening, for they can expect a bruising battle on the Asat issue if the policy contained in the Asat report to Congress, due next week, is no more than a wornout laundry list of reasons why the United States needs to deploy an Asat and why Asat arms control is not workable. A simplistic analysis of that sort would show that the administration is out of step with the times. We hope for and expect something better than that. What we want and will be looking for is a serious discussion of how the administration plans to pursue this issue through diplomacy, and not simply through weapons deployments.

SENATE—Thursday, April 26, 1990

(Legislative day of Wednesday, April 18, 1990)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable WENDELL H. FORD, a Senator from the State of Kentucky.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

O Lord, thou hast searched me, and known me. Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising, thou understandest my thought afar off. Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways. For there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, O Lord, thou knowest it altogether.—Psalm 139:1-4.

Gracious Father in Heaven, the psalmist reminds us we have no secrets from Thee. Thou knowest the tendency of people in powerful positions to repress feelings—to "stuff" pain, frustration, anger, anxiety. Emotions implode rather than explode; pressure builds precipitating attitudes, actions or words later regretted.

In a culture which demands optimism, which treats pessimism as evil, we conceal discouragement. In these consummately stressful days, help the powerful people of the Senate, in the privacy of their hearts, to release to Thee emotions which are destructive when repressed, in the confidence that Thou dost understand. Free them, Lord, from the prison of repression. In Jesus' name who came to liberate. Amen.

A DRUG-FREE LIFE

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, it is not every day that we have the privilege of starting with an uplifting experience, but I had that happen this morning. I thought I would relay to the Senators here and in their offices what happened this morning out on the steps of the Capitol. We had a group of young people from Council Bluffs IA, high schools—Malvern, the Iowa School for the Deaf—Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, Lewis Central, and—here this morning to present a petition by 5,000 young people, pledging themselves to a drug-free life.

Mr. President, when you see these kids and their chaperones and the people who came with them, it underscores what I have said so often: That the war on drugs is not going to be won here in Washington, DC, and it is not going to be won just in our big cities, but it is going to be won all over America. It is going to have to take involvement from people from all walks of life, of all ages, but especially our young people.

Earlier this year, Mr. Dick Miller, who is a pharmacist in Council Bluffs, began to organize this petition drive. He used an organization called B-MAD [Body and Mind Against Drugs] founded 9 years ago, which uses the power of positive peer pressure by getting drug and alcohol free students to help grade school kids do the same. They have done a great job. He gave them a challenge earlier this year that if they could get this petition signed, he would bring them to Washington DC. In fact, the chief of police of Council Bluffs, Mark Moline, said if they got it done, he would drive the bus and, in fact, he did drive the bus.

I am really proud that the chief of police, Mark Moline and Lt. Ron Shaw of the Council Bluffs Police would take the time to drive these kids to Washington, DC.

But to see this petition, 160 some feet long, with 5,000 student signatures, was something that is such an uplifting experience to start the day off right because, it demonstrates the strength of these young people's commitment to being drug-free. They have done a great job. Here is the pledge. It says:

I pledge myself a drug-free life. I will enjoy and practice the activities that show that I believe in myself. And I will join the crusade to stop others from taking alcohol and drugs.

Then they sign it. This is what they got 5,000 young people in the Council Bluffs and rural areas to sign.

The petition they signed reads:

Substance abuse is not just a big city, urban problem. The Nation's midland such as Iowa are experiencing drug abuse problems. Prevention education offers the greatest potential for effectively dealing with the drug problem. Additional resources should be earmarked for such education.

Mr. President, again underscoring the need to ensure that we do some reordering of our priorities, I understand that we have to interdict drugs coming into this country, that we need to beef up our law enforcement officials to make sure that we can have good arrests and make sure our prosecution is the best so we can put the drug pushers behind bars, but let us not forget that we have the best effect when we put the resources into early childhood education and into prevention programs.

As a parent of a 13 year old and an 8 year old, I can attest to the fact that the best pressure is peer pressure. Young people do listen to other young people, and when you have young people like this who are in high school, reaching down to their brothers, their sisters, their neighbors in grade school and talking to them about being alcohol and drug free, I tell you, that has more effect than any pronouncements from this Senate floor or the House or anywhere else.

Mr. President, I hope that other young people and parents, chiefs of police around the United States, would perhaps take a page from this book and do the same kind of project, get young people involved and get them into prevention.

Prevention and education, that is really where we get the most bang for the buck, and that is why we have to look ahead to our next generation, to make sure the next generation of young people is able to say no to drugs and no to alcohol.

I compliment Dick Miller for what he has done, Police Chief Mark Moline, Lt. Ron Shaw, the chaperones who are with them and, most important of all, I thank the young people for all that they have done, Mr. President, and to encourage them to keep up the good work, not only in keeping themselves drug- and alcohol-free but reaching out to as many young people as they can to make sure that they are alcohol- and drug-free. Specifically, I want to list by name those young people who have traveled to Washington by bus to present this petition this morning:

Shane Sayers, Trisha Alba, Danielle Eitmann, Rebecca Moline, Kim Cooper, Bryan Holder, Michelle Blachnik, Charity Boulton, Ryan Meis, Stephanie Hawkins, Jodie Hiatt, Brad Michael, Clay Chickering, Shawn Tackett, Clayton Westervelt, LeAnn Steppuhn, Brian Kruse, Janice Krause, Ellen Thayer, and Don Hunt.

I congratulate you for all your work and for your commitment to make Council Bluffs drug-free. All America can learn by your example.

Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time and I note the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LIEBERMAN addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may proceed for 5 minutes.

LITHUANIA

Mr. LIEBERMAN. Mr. President, it is not always the case in international politics that right and wrong are clearly on separate sides of an important issue, but I firmly believe that this is true today in Lithuania and the Baltic States. President Gorbachev himself has acknowledged that Lithuania was shamefully annexed by Stalin in 1940. Yet, he, President Gorbachev, is today engaged in an economic blockade that is slowly strangling the country of Lithuania. Factories are shutting down and food lines will soon grow.

President Landsbergis yesterday called this another Munich and he had reference, of course, to the statement and action of Prime Minister Chamberlain of England who referred to the dismembered Czechoslovakia as a small faraway country "about which we know little."

Mr. President, the issue today is whether we will consider Lithuania once again as a small faraway country about which we know little and care even less. I personally believe that we should have extended diplomatic recognition to Lithuania upon its declaration of independence. Far from being provocative, that would have been consistent with American foreign policy since 1940.

For 50 years, our State Department has continued to accept the credentials of the diplomatic representatives of an independent Lithuania and their Baltic neighbors. For 50 years, American Ambassadors to the Soviet Union have not visited the Baltic Republics in order to avoid bestowing a sense of legitimacy on the Soviet occupation of those countries. For 50 years, we representatives of the American people have extended our hope and support to the people of the captive nations. To cold shoulder, to turn our backs on the idea of diplomatic relations now with Lithuania and the Baltic States when it finally may mean something, is to me the worst form of timidity, vacillation, and is not at all true statesmanship.

I also reject the idea that we should not recognize Lithuania because its government is allegedly not in total control of its territory. That principle certainly did not stop us from recognizing President Endara of Panama after his election was nullified by Noriega. If we could recognize President Endara while he was hiding in basements of different houses in his country every night, we could surely recognize the duly elected fully supported government of Prime Minister Landsbergis in Vilnius, Lithuania.

I also believe that we should reject the Soviet arguments that the present situation is comparable to the American Civil War. That comparison is ridiculous. The Lithuanian people never asked to join the union. They were forcibly incorporated into the czarist empire as part of an era of the colonial expansion of the European peoples. They were victimized by the pact between Hitler and Stalin. Mr. President, Mikhail Gorbachev may be good but he is no Abraham Lincoln.

I would be the first to agree that this Lithuanian situation is a delicate one but I think we can clearly show our support for the Lithuanian people and their independence in constructive ways. We can, for example, recommend to the Soviets that they seek mediating forums such as the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, the World Court, and the United Nations. We can suggest to the Lithuanian leadership that it accept transition procedures. We can recommend to both sides that Soviet military facilities be given special status in Lithuania for some transitional period of time. We can suggest that a Baltic free trade area is established that would economically link the Scandinavian countries, Germany, Poland, and the Soviet Union together with the independent Baltic States. None of those actions would destabilize or should destabilize President Gorbachev's government.

Mr. President, no leader, including Gorbachev, himself, deserves a blank check. No leader, including President Gorbachev, himself, and our interest in good relations with the Russians, is reason for us to sacrifice our first principles and our consistent diplomatic policy for the last 50 years.

President Landsbergis has told the world that he is willing to negotiate with Moscow, and he sent several delegations there only to find that nobody in the Soviet Union will meet with him. Moscow's only reply is to tighten the economic blockade as part of a campaign to break the spirit of the Lithuanian people.

Mr. President, for 45 years we have stood by the side of the peoples of Eastern Europe. We have done this knowing full well that it would anger Moscow, but we did so because we believed it was right. I see no reason to change that policy today.

Perhaps the most dramatic movement in our history of relations with Eastern Europe occurred in 1961 when President Kennedy went to Berlin shortly after the construction of the wall to declare that he was a Berliner. Today we must not allow the Berlin Wall to be replaced by an American wall of silence around Lithuania.

The United States cannot turn its back on any people who are striving to be part of a vision of a free and independent Europe. Lithuania and the Baltic States belong to that vision as much as any other European state, and the full of Europe will not be truly free, nor will the cold war truly be over until Lithuania and the Baltic States are free.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

Mr. DURENBERGER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBB). The Senator from Minnesota is recognized.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. DURENBERGER. I ask unanimous consent that the time for morning business be extended for 5 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE DEATH OF FRANK LAUSCHE

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, the excellent statement on Lithuania by my colleague from Connecticut is an opportunity for me, to say a few words, among the many that I would like to say, about a Slovenian who once served here. Slovenia is now part of Yugoslavia. Maybe it will not be for too long, because the Slovenians just voted three or four to one that they want to be Slovenians.

The greatest American Slovenian of all who served in this body from the State of Ohio was Frank Lausche. Frank died over the last weekend. I came to the Senate long after he was here. He was a legend, as far as I was concerned. He was one of those Democrats that voted like a Republican, before it became popular. The lesson for us, on both sides of the aisle, is that he always put the Nation's interest above his party's. "Vote for your country," was his constant refrain. I had never met a Senator who was so much a person as Frank Lausche.

Those of my colleagues who belong to the Democratic Party knew him as an independent. You know that his ADA rating 1 year was 8 percent, in one of the most liberal periods of time. You know the State and constituency from which he came are not among the most conservative or nonunion constituencies in this country. And it is with a great sense of how lucky I am to have known a person like that, that I rise to remind my colleagues that being yourself as a Member of this body has a tremendous bottom line to it. It is costly, but ultimately it is worth it.

Frank Lausche lived to be 94 years of age. He came practically every Wednesday morning to the Senate Prayer Breakfast at 8 o'clock, and he came at 8 o'clock because when he was here, it began at 8 and went until 9. So he always came at 8, and he drove himself until he was 94, drove his old car, and we all figured when he left to go out to his car, God help the pedestrians. But he did that because he was so fiercely independent in personal ways, and in what he said.

Lawton Chiles, who sort of supervised the prayer breakfast sometimes, gave him the name, the "Jeremiah" of our times. When we gathered in fellowship on these mornings, whenever we wanted to hear the voice of a prophet setting us straight on the mores of the times, we would turn to Frank Lausche where he sat at the front of the table.

So I just loved the man a great deal. I did not spend enough time with him, and that is an unfortunate thing about being in this place. There was so much to learn from him, both in his public life and his private life. But the best of all was that, for him, they were the same. It was not a private Lausche who did one thing and a Senator who did something else. He was the same person, regardless. He loved this body a great deal. He loved everybody in it. But he also had the nerve, so to speak, to always tell us when we were wrong, to praise us when we were right, and to remind all of us from whence we came.

Frank Lausche embodied qualities that are sorely needed in this body: conviction, candor and political selflessness. I am so grateful for what he gave to me over the years. I hope all of us in this place will learn the lessons of Frank Lausche's distinguished and fruitful life.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article from the New York Times regarding Frank Lausche's death be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FRANK LAUSCHE, EX-OHIO SENATOR AND 5-TERM GOVERNOR, DIES AT 94

(By Wolfgang Saxon)

Frank J. Lausche, an independent-minded Democrat who served as Mayor of Cleveland, Governor of Ohio and a two-term United States Senator, died Saturday at the Slovene Home for the Aging in Cleveland. He was 94 years old.

Nominally a Democrat, Mr. Lausche was philosophically a staunch conservative and was a good vote-getter; Over the years, he made some political capital with his antagonism toward organized labor, but in the end, that and his open disdain for the Democratic Party organization finished his political career in 1968 at the age of 72.

A tall, rugged man with bushy hair, Frank Lausche could be a charmer and spellbinder on the stump: Ignoring political issues, his oratory fixed on simple American virtues as he perceived them, urging citizens to cast their ballots with the nation in mind.

VOTE FOR YOUR COUNTRY!

"Listen to the voice of the Americans who fell on the battlefield!" he would exclaim. "Cast selfishness aside and vote for the good of your state and country!"

In that spirit, he focused on national concerns in the Senate and refused to do the routine favors that party officials at home expected from elected representatives in Congress.

Mr. Lausche was born on Nov. 14, 1895, in Cleveland, one of 10 children of immigrants from Slovenia, in Yugoslavia. His parents, of modest means, were leaders in their local community, but his father died when he was 13. The boy then worked as a lamplighter and sold newspapers.

LEAVES BASEBALL FOR LAW

He was a minor league baseball player before he joined the Army in 1918. He earned a commission, and after World War I gave up baseball in favor of the law, earning a degree from the John Marshall School of Law.

In 1931, when Ohio Democrats were undergoing a bitter division, Mr. Lausche backed the winning side and was appointed a municipal judge, Known as a crusader against gambling, he was elected Mayor of Cleveland in 1941 with a record 71 percent of the vote.

But he soon parted company with the party leadership. Through two terms as Mayor and five as Governor, he gained a reputation for being clean and independent, cautious and frugal. His conservative program of low taxes and budget surpluses brought him both the friendship of many Republicans and the dislike of liberals.

He served one term as Governor in 1945-46 and then four more terms from 1949 to 1956, and that year he won election to the Senate.

In 1967 Senator Lausche was the author of the first bill seeking to impose a uniform

Federal strip-mining regulatory system to replace varied and mostly ineffective controls then in force in the coal states. But the legislation languished on Capitol Hill until well after his retirement.

SUPPORTER OF KENNEDY

A surprise backer of John F. Kennedy, Mr. Lausche then opposed many policies of the Democratic President's Administration, including aid to education, foreign aid, medical care for the aged under Social Security and civil rights legislation.

Senator Lausche was defeated in his final campaign for the Senate, losing the Democratic primary in 1968 to a former member of the House, John J. Gilligan, who ran with strong labor support. Mr. Gilligan was defeated by Ohio's Attorney General, William B. Saxbe, a Republican.

Mr. Lausche once again showed his independence when he endorsed President Richard M. Nixon for a second term in 1972, saying the national security and popular welfare required it. He discounted Mr. Nixon's opponent, Senator George S. McGovern, as "indecisive and inconsistent." He had also supported Mr. Nixon in 1968.

He is survived by a sister, Josephine Lausche Welf of Cleveland.

Mr. BURNS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana [Mr. BURNS] is recognized.

Mr. BURNS. I think the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. BURNS pertaining to the introduction of S. 2524 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY].

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, must I ask unanimous consent that morning business be extended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would be an appropriate request at this time.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I so request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the period for morning business is extended.

The Senator from Iowa is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Let me assure the managers of a very important supplemental appropriation bill that must come up today and that I do not intend my remarks to interfere with their doing business. If they request my stopping, I will be glad to stop at any point.

DEFENSE FUNDING LEVELS

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, as the Congress continues to debate future defense funding levels, the declining budgets that we all know are coming make it imperative to manage our defense dollars to achieve the greatest possible return on that investment.

Yesterday I spoke about the problems afflicting the management of our defense resources. I characterized the essential problem as a disconnect between plans and execution. If this problem is not addressed, then the cuts we make in future defense budgets will have a very harmful impact on our national security.

Today, I would like to discuss the outline of a framework for contributing toward resolving the defense management paradox, as I described it yesterday. A number of reports have been published in recent years to set forth solutions to planning and execution problems. But they have focused mainly on reforming just the acquisition process.

But the nature of the paradox that confronts us such that all levels within the Department of Defense are affected. Therefore, in order to improve planning and execution of the defense program, the issue becomes not just acquisition reform, but rather management reform.

Secretary Cheney has recognized the need to go beyond acquisition reform in his defense management report. That is a report that was put out by Secretary Cheney last July as a response and an answer to the President's State of the Union Message in 1989 that this President was going to actually reform defense.

Defense management reforms are needed for the following reasons: First, to establish national security objectives; second, to set priorities for achieving those objectives; and third, to allocate resources to achieve those objectives.

And, of course, all of this must be done within the context of realistic funding constraints.

The reforms must incorporate measures of merit for tracking progress toward meeting the objectives. The reforms that pertain to Government Industry relationships and congressional defense related activities must be made in line with improvements in the defense management framework. The activities of all the players, whether DOD, industry, or those of us in Congress, should all be tied to the efficiency by which national security objectives are achieved.

The absolute key requirement for the Defense Department to make balanced gains in capability—that is, across the four capability pillars of modernization, force structure, readiness and sustainability—the absolute key is the establishment of defense program objectives.

And the defense management review that Secretary Cheney wrote recognized this and called for the Department of Defense components to submit program planning objectives, called PPO's. These PPO's were to be prioritized, and each would be assigned a road map for investment needs, something that they would use to explain how much money that ought to be required for a certain objective, the same judgments we must make here in the Congress. These road maps are very important. This part of the planning process would thereby tie objectives and resources together prior to our making decisions, not just us in Congress, but people in the whole process, the Defense Department, and every place else in government.

The defense management review recommendations, aside from the PPO's and the road maps concentrate mainly upon just reforming the acquisition system.

But the reform did not consider acquisition improvement within the larger context of defense management reform. In other words, the defense management review failed to address management of the majority of defense resources.

It is for that reason that I have put together a structure to help ensure our national security objectives are achieved and that our investment is balanced across the four capability pillars. To accomplish this, I have drawn upon modern management techniques, recognized by top management experts, to construct four essential pillars of effective defense management.

These management pillars incorporate and build upon the recommendations identified by the Secretary of Defense.

The four are:

First, a decisionmaking framework for setting objectives and for managing to achieve those objectives;

Second, an organizational structure of DOD elements, including responsibilities and reporting lines;

Third, the efficient allocation of resources, which governs the defense budget, personnel, and equipment resources that are used to achieve those objectives; and

Fourth, and last, quantitative measures of success which are very necessary for assessing progress toward achieving those objectives. These four management pillars apply to both industry and Government. In my estimation, Secretary Cheney's defense management review has considered only the first two of these pillars. But it is the final two that are the key for ensuring success. When taken together, these four pillars would ensure the following:

First, that national security objectives are set;

Second, that the management organization is streamlined toward achieving the objectives;

Third, that resources are aligned with the objectives, and Fourth, that progress is tracked.

The reforms set forth by Secretary Cheney will encounter much resistance from a bureaucracy that is successful in "working the system" and undermining threats to "business as usual." It is especially for that reason that pillars 3 and 4 are implemented. In the days ahead, I intend to speak more specifically about each of these four pillars and why they are important and also about the culture resistance, meaning culture resistance within DOD, within the military industrial complex where there is resistance to these reforms.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise to inform my colleagues that today marks the 1,867th day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

I would also like to bring to the attention of the Senate an article written by Martin Kramer which appears in the April 30, 1990, edition of the New Republic. While the recent release of Robert Polhill renders inaccurate some of the facts presented in the article, Mr. Kramer's trenchant analysis of the hostage situation is relevant and worthy of our attention. I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD. as follows:

PRICES ARE NEGOTIABLE: HOSTAGE BAZAAR

(By Martin Kramer)

An editorial in the Tehran Times of February 22 set off the latest wave of expectation. "Muslim forces," it declared, "should work to get the hostages free with no precondition." The Tehran Times is the mouthpiece of Iran's president, Ali Akbar Hashemi-Rafsanjani, and Rafasnjani is the target of President Bush's repeated declarations that "goodwill begets goodwill." Iran's "goodwill" translates into the release of American hostages in Lebanon. The "goodwill" of the United States means the lifting of trade embargoes and a new beginning in Iranian-American relations. Administration officials may have the makings of a deal.

But no freed Americans have yet winced at bright camera lights in Damascus and Wiesbaden. In an unrelated development, Palestinian terrorist Abu Nidal surrendered three of his European hostages. But Rafsanjani has delievered only more editorials, all promising to use Iran's leverage with the Shiite groups that hold the Americans. The hitch: any understanding reached in the back channels of U.S.-Iranian diplomacy must now get through the rubbled back alleys of Beruit's southern suburbs, where the hostages are kept. Their keepers have some leverage of their own, and the real bargaining has only just begun.

There are three clusters of American hostages held in Lebanon. Each cluster is held by a Shiitte group that makes claims under a distinct name; each name is associated with a different logic for hostage-holding. There is a question about whether the three groups are completely separate, since all are affiliated with Hezbollah, the larger Shiite movement backed by Iran. But there are certainly three distinct Lebanese arguments for keeping foreigners in leg irons. Before Rafsanjani can deliver the American hostages, he will have to defeat them all.

Islamic Jihad is the most veteran of the hostage holding networks. The group originally rested upon the planning genius of Imad Mughniyya, a Shiite from South Lebanon, and the bomb-making skills of his cousin. Together they are believed by some analysts to have carried off the suicide bombings against American and French targets in 1983. In those glorious days Islamic Jihad had no private agenda but simply served Iran's Islamic revolution and Hezbollah.

But at the end of 1983, Kuwaiti authorities captured the bomb-making cousin and a group of coconspirators, following a failed attempt to blow up the American and French embassies. Mughniyya's cousin was sentenced to death by a Kuwaiti court, along with two other Shiites. Another fourteen defendants drew prison sentences. Since that time Islamic Jihad has devoted much of its energy to freeing those on Kuwait's death row. Islamic Jihad knew that the Emir of Kuwait would never surrender to a gang of schismatic Shiites on his own accord. But it did believe him to be an agent of the United States, who would slavishly do America's bidding. Islamic Jihad therefore took Americans in Lebanon as hostages and held them against the lives of the condemned Shiites in Kuwait. Sure enough, the Emir didn't free the convicted men, but he did refrain from giving the regal nod to the executions.

Through all of this, Islamic Jihad dutifully worked hand in hand with Iran. When foreign hostages were easy to come by—before the Syrian deployment in West Beirut in 1987—Islamic Jihad periodically seized Americans and Frenchmen as a favor to Iran. Iran then spent them for French financial concessions and U.S. arms. But Islamic Jihad prudently insisted upon keeping at least two Americans as a guarantee against the mistreatment or execution of the Shiites held in Kuwait, and as a bargaining chip for their eventual release. That's what thwarted the Iran mission of Robert McFarlane and Oliver North. And that's why Islamic Jihad still clings to Terry Anderson and Thomas Sutherland, both taken in 1985. (By keeping two hostages in separate places, Islamic Jihad can't be put out of business by the sudden discovery or death of one hostage.)

Of all the bands of hostage-holders, Islamic Jihad has the most intimate tie to Iran, but Iran also owes it the most. While the Gulf War lasted, it did noble service as an Iranian fifth column, both in Lebanon and Kuwait. In addition to Islamic Jihad's claim on Iranian gratitude, it holds the blue chip hostage. Anderson is the longest-suffering captive and a journalist who had legitimate business in Lebanon. His sister and fellow journalists have made him into a cause célèbre, and he commands the lion's share of sympathy for the hostages.

Islamic Jihad won't simply give away this prize, and for good cause. Although the Emir of Kuwait may have decided not to order the execution of the condemned "brethren," Islamic Jihad believes the release of its hostages might tempt him. So Rafsanjani must secure concessions from Kuwait, involving either the release of the condemned Shiites or a commutation of their death sentences. Failing that, Rafsanjani must persuade Islamic Jihad that he has found a more effective method for helping "the brethren" in Kuwait than the holding of American hostages. Gaining an explicit Kuwaiti concession will be tough, and getting the hostages without one will be tougher. Still, it is noteworthy that Islamic Jihad kept silent throughout the latest round of hostage speculation, and its most overt apologist in Hezbollah has hinted cryptically at progress. If there has been movement, it has probably been here.

A second cluster of American hostages is held by the Revolutionary Justice Organization. Its three Americans—Joseph Cicippio, Edward Tracy, and (in all likelihood) Frank Reed—were seized in the fall of 1986, just when Islamic Jihad seemed likely to trade away all its Americans. The logic of the Revolutionary Justice Organization holds that the very presence of American hostages has shielded the Shiite suburbs against hostile aggression. It would be folly to trade them all off for American arms, economic concessions to Iran, or Shiite detainees. Once the last American hostage goes free, what will prevent the Syrians, with American blessing and Saudi financial backing, from quashing Hezbollah in Beirut's Shiite suburbs? What will keep American agents and Israeli bombers from coming back to wreak vengeance? What will prevent a new Sabra and Shatila, this time perpetrated against Shiites?

Many of Hezbollah's Iranian backers have asked themselves the same questions and have sanctioned the Revolutionary Justice Organization. The group held other hostages—Frenchmen who were traded away by Iran, and other foreigners who were sold for cash. But Americans are talismans too precious to be bartered away, and the Revolutionary Justice Organization has made no systematic demands for their release. Instead, the Americans are threatened with death whenever the United States (or its "agents," such as Israel) seems poised to strike the Muslims of Lebanon.

To effect the release of these three, Rafsanjani has to convince the Revolutionary Justice Organization that its logic is flawed—that by holding American hostages, the group has tightened the Syrian noose around the Shiite suburbs, where Syrian forces now man checkpoints. The argument is a bit tortured, for though it may be true to a point, it may also be true that hostages are the best guarantee for the survival of their captors. Rafsanjani is arguing that less tangible guarantees—from the Syrians, of all people—will do almost as well. Presented with this argument, the Revolutionary Justice Organization tried to burst the latest bubble of hostage talk with an angry statement rejecting any release. Rafsanjani has only begun to undermine this rationale, which is also echoed by Hezbollah's hardline Iranian patron, former Interior Minister Ali Akbar Mohtashemi. "Freedom for the hostages," he maintains, "means breaking the chains of bloodthirsty wolves."

The third cluster of Americans is held by the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine. Its captives are three American educators, taken together in January 1987: Robert Polhill, Alann Steen, and Jesse

Turner. The logic here recalls that of Islamic Jihad: take Americans hostage in order to force the hand of a third party holding Shiite detainees. In this case the third party is Israel: Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine proposes to exchange the three Americans for some 300 Shiites held in a prison camp run by the Israeli-backed South Lebanon Army. In an act of solidarity, the group has also added Palestinians imprisoned by Israel to its wish list. The group looks to the precedent of the 1985 hijacking of TWA Flight 847 to Beirut—a crisis resolved when Israel agreed to release more than 700 Shiite detainees to gain freedom for the American passengers. If it isn't too late to reenact the triumphs of the seventh century, why not those of 1985?

But the deal proposed by the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine simply will not fly. When Israel released Shiite detainees for the hijacked Americans, Shiite fundamentalists held no Israelis. Now they do; as many as three Israeli servicemen are held by Hezbollah. They are the only key to the prison gates in South Lebanon and the cell door of Sheikh Abdul Karim Obeid, the Hezbollah cleric whom Israelis abducted last summer. Nor are the three American professors the moral equivalent of the TWA passengers. By the time they were abducted, these foolish souls had been warned many times to get out of harm's way and leave Muslim Beirut. Their plight has stirred more incredulity than sympathy among most Americans. In the unregulated market of hostage-trading, the three educators are junk bonds. Their value is uncertain, and is probably a good deal less than their owners think. Still, the United States has made it clear to Rafsanjani that "goodwill" can flow only after all of the American hostages are out; they must be worth something.

But their market value will become clear only after Israeli soldiers are swapped for Shiite detainees. Until then, the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine cannot be seen to have abandoned the Shiite "strugglers" who languish in Israeli captivity. The group's latest statement still demands an "exchange." But when Israel does its deal for its soldiers, the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine won't throw in the three professors as a bonus for Israel. At that point, the group's most logical tack would be to shift gears and offer its hostages in return for getting Hezbollah back into South Lebanon.

That may prove to be the most drawn-out negotiation of all. A year after the three wayward profs were spirited away, the rival Shiite Amal movement, with the backing of Syria, drove Hezbollah from its redoubts in the South. Since then, lots of bad blood has been spilled in internecine feuding. Some 3,000 Hezbollah sympathizers have been chased out of the South and are now demanding to go back. Their purpose, they declare, is not to displace Amal, but to prosecute their sacred struggle—their jihad—against Israel. If the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine tied the release of the three professors to Hezbollah's return to the South, it could strike a heroic pose, and perhaps salvage a return on its hostages. But Rafsanjani would have to do a difficult deal with the Syrians and the Amal movement to allow Hezbollah's descent southward. The basis of that agreement—the so-called Damascus Accord—exists only on paper. Iran will have to subsidize its implementation with favors and straightforward payoffs.

Shiite hostage-holders and Syrian presidents don't get taken to the cleaners. Doing deals with them is bound to be punishing and protracted. Nor can Rafsanjani expect unanimous support at home for his efforts. Some domestic opponents who reject any reconciliation with the Great Satan are demanding that he bow out and let the hostage-holders choose their own course. Other critics are actively urging the hostage-holders to swallow their keys. Rafsanjani is playing three-dimensional chess with a dozen boards, and a mistake on any one of them could ruin his game.

But Rafsanjani draws upon a deep reservoir of zerangi, that manipulative guile raised to an art in Persian politics. He also knows how to issue veiled threats and make elusive promises. The hostage-holders need Iran's protection; the Syrians want that cutrate Iranian oil. Improved leverage has made Rafsanjani show (or feign) new optimism about his ability to bring the hostages out. The latest word from his camp followers puts the target date for release of all the hostages at the end of 1990, and suggests that they might be released in "stages" during the year. Each stage might well be the release of one of the cluster described above.

But there is always "Factor X": fidgeting by the Bush administration while Arabs and Persians practice their traditional art of commerce. This is not Eastern Europe. Middle Eastern history isn't on fast-forward, but advances frame by frame. A lot of patient work has created incentives without compromising principles, setting Iran's president in slow motion. But the "hostage process" can alway be arrested by some gaffe akin to the East Jerusalem debacle. Note how Bush took a needless risk by boasting of the amazing things he is doing behind the scenes to effect a hostage release. That hardly helps to convince the hostage-holders that the United States has made its final offer. Thankfully, Bush's attempted phone call to Rafsanjani went straight to a hoaxer. Who knows what new misunderstandings might have arisen? Persia's head of state cannot help wondering what stirs this inscrutable Occidental.

NOTCH BABIES

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, in 1977, Congress approved a plan designed to eliminate a perceived overadjustment for inflation contained in the Social Security benefit formula. This provided a new benefit formula for workers born after 1916. To protect people from an abrupt change in benefits, a transition formula was included in the new plan. This transition formula would have provided for a smooth changeover by dividing Social Security beneficiaries into three categories: those born before 1917, those born between 1917 and 1921—the so-called notch years—and those born after 1921.

The transition formula failed. Supporters of the plan knew benefits under the new plan would be lower—which was the intent—but they grossly underestimated the disparity they would be creating for the notch babies. Under the formula, benefits were expected to be 5 to 7 percent less than those projected under the 1972 law. Instead, workers with the same earnings record, retiring at the age of 65, and born only a few days apart, one in 1916 and one in 1917, experienced a difference in Social Security benefits of up to $1,300 each year.

The Social Security Administration reports that of the approximately 24 million retired American workers currently receiving benefits, approximately 6.6 million are and will be affected by the notch disparity.

The failure of the transition guarantee to protect those born in the notch years is primarily due to two provisions of the formula. First, post-age 62 earnings of people born after 1916 are excluded when calculating the benefits for these workers. Second, benefit increases occurring before the year a worker reached age 62 are not factored into his or her initial benefits, as they would have been under the former rules.

I am aware of the budget constraints facing us this year, but legislation to address the unfair treatment of those retired workers affected by the notch disparity must be passed.

I long have been working to seek a solution to this problem. As early as 1983 and again in 1985, I cosponsored legislation directing the Secretary of Health and Human Services and the Commissioner of Social Security to study the notch benefit disparity and report to Congress on how this problem could be corrected.

On September 30, 1986, I introduced legislation, S. 2892, to amend title II of the Social Security Act to restore benefits to notch babies. That bill was reintroduced as S. 1119 on May 1, 1987, and as S. 37 on January 25, 1989. I also joined Senator SANFORD in the 100th Congress in introducing S. 1830, the Social Security Notch Adjustment Act.

Senior citizens across the country, in addition to the many senior citizen organizations, have mobilized to protect and preserve their benefits from the budget ax. Senior citizens also wish to recoup those Social Security benefits lost due to the gross error in the automatic benefit increase provision in 1972.

On May 1, 1990, thousands of senior citizens, many from my home State of Pennsylvania, are scheduled to assemble at the Capitol to voice their opposition to the Social Security benefit inequity. They will ask Congress to vote on this notch issue, once and for all, in all fairness to them. They also urge Congress to separate the Social Security trust fund from the budget so that they and the future baby boomers will get their fair share of Social Security benefits. One important group in this effort is the Notch Babies Organization of Pennsylvania.

The time has arrived for us to send a strong message to senior citizens that this body will preserve and protect all benefits which our elderly so richly deserve. Accordingly, I urge my collegues to join in supporting legislation to restore Social Security benefit equity.

RECRUITING NEW TEACHERS, INC.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the United States educational system is in dire need of well-trained teachers. According to the Department of Education, between 1990 and 2000, we will need to hire 2.5 million new teachers, an average of 250,000 per year.

This increase in demand for teachers is especially critical with respect to minority teachers. While the number of minority students is increasing, the number of minority teachers is falling. If current trends continue, by 1995, minorities will make up 30 percent of the student population nationally, but will be less than 5 percent of the teacher population.

We also face a tremendous need for bilingual education teachers. This situation will also get worse: Between the years 1985 and 2000, the language minority population will increase at 2½ times the rate of the general student populaltion.

Our educational system is tragically underequipped to handle the particular needs of special education children. In 1986, 27,474 additional special education teachers were needed in the Nation's schools to fill vacancies and replace uncertified teachers.

Our system is facing a critical shortage in the number of fully qualified math and science teachers. By 1996, we will need twice as many math and science teachers as we have teachers qualified in these fields today. But for every new math or science teacher entering the field, 13 are leaving.

Mr. President, these shortages must be overcome if the United States is to remain competitive in the world economy. It is as simple as that.

While many individuals and organizations are working to address the teachers shortage, I would like to call my colleague's attention to one group that is making a heroic effort to increase the flow of talent into the teaching profession. Recruiting New Teachers, Inc., based in Cambridge, MA, has developed a multifaceted media campaign designed to encourage individuals to consider a career as a teacher. Every RNT radio or television advertisement aired is accompanied by a toll-free telephone number from which further information is available. RNT provides information on teaching careers, including information on how one can become a teacher, and targeted referrals for these potential teachers. They provide tailored recruitment lists to their network partners throughout the country. These network partners, such as colleges, universities, and school systems can then contact prospective teachers directly. RNT has benefited from philanthropic donations and an ambitious media campaign developed with the Ad Council and aired on television as a public service.

Since public service advertisements began appearing in April 1988, RNT has received more than 250,000 calls. Thirty percent of the respondents have been minorities, 69 percent of the respondents have been age 23 or over, and 55 percent of the respondents have a bachelor's or higher degree. Clearly RNT is reaching a sizable audience of people who have already completed their education but who are willing to consider a teaching career.

America needs more groups like RNT. Their work is vitally important to our future. We must educate our youth so that they will be properly prepared for life in the 21st century and beyond. Without an adequate supply of highly qualified and motivated teachers, we will fail to meet our goals.

Mr. President, RNT has a distinguished board of directors that is chaired by David Rockefeller, Jr. Its executive director is David Hasselkorn. I commend Mr. Rockefeller, the other trustees, Mr. Hasselkorn, and the able staff of this fine organization for the important job they are doing.

END OF AN ERA IN PEMBINA

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, newspapers have changed a great deal since 1910. That was the year Roy DeFrance purchased a weekly newspaper just south of the Canadian border and started a great family tradition. Roy was famous for his editorials and for the many years he lovingly handset his publication.

Now I note with nostalgia that the Pembina New Era has changed hands. Ione DeFrance, Roy's daughter, is retiring from the family business, and the new owner, Gunnard Ness, is expanding his chain of weekly newspapers in North Dakota. A new era has begun.

I ask unanimous consent that an Associated Press story about Roy and Ione DeFrance be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Bismarck (ND) Tribune, Mar. 18, 1990]

PAPER ENTERS ITS OWN NEW ERA

PEMBINA.—If Roy DeFrance were still alive, he might sit down and write an editorial calling it the end of an era for the New Era.

But Roy DeFrance isn't alive and his daughter Ione DeFrance isn't fond of writing editorials.

Readers found out the hometown newspaper has changed hands in a routine news item in last week's paper.

It still will be the New Era with Noreen Hagness as editor, but things won't be quite the same.

The newspaper has been synonymous with the DeFrance family ever since 1910, when young Roy DeFrance—then a telegraph operator for the Great Northern Railway in St. Vincent, Minn—learned the local newspaper was for sale. He bought the galleys of type, the press and everything else needed to put together the handset publication.

He christened it the St. Vincent New Era.

"It was right at the turn of the century, and there was a new century coming up," his daughter said.

The paper stayed in St. Vincent until 1929, when the newspaper across the river in Pembina burned DeFrance and his paper crossed the Red River to become the Pembina New Era.

His daughter got started in the newspaper trade after 1941, when her father needed the help.

"After World War II started, the boys were all gone," she said. "I really got started then, setting type."

That was the main part of the trade DeFrance practiced—picking and assembling words, then sentences, then paragraphs of lead type a character at a time. He wasn't totally at odds with technology. He printed his newspaper on a cylinder press operated by electricity.

But the New Era drew attention from far away because it was one of the last handset newspapers in the United States. The Milwaukee Journal visited once for a photo story for its Sunday magazine.

The people at the New Era went on assembling rows of type by hand—persistently a part of a vanished era—until 1969, when DeFrance finally began contracting with Ness Press Inc. of Fordville to do its printing. That is the company that has now bought the newspaper from DeFrance's daughter.

DeFrance died in 1975, 99 years and five months old. The paper hasn't changed very much since then, but some.

There are a few more subscribers than there used to be. The New Era goes out to about 850 households. There were 765 subscribers in DeFrance's day.

And there aren't the editorials there once were. Ione DeFrance is a conservative but not like the fiery conservative her father was.

He who once wrote U.S. troops in Vietnam might learn from Sherman's March to the Sea and finish the business once and for all with a march into North Vietnam.

Ione DeFrance speculates occasionally about what sort of things her father might turn his pen to these days.

"Government spending was his main worry, and waste," she said. "I'm sure he wouldn't approve of all these protesters burning flags and this and that. He'd probably call them publicity hounds.

IN MEMORY OF SENATOR MATSUNAGA

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I have a few thoughts I would like to share with the Chamber about the passing of a dear friend of mine; Senator SPARK MATSUNAGA. Since Sparky's death this past Sunday there has been a tremendous outpouring of tribute to this truly great man. I could certainly join my colleagues in this regard; Sparky's life is a testament to a man with a uniquely humanitarian dedication to this Nation, the State of Hawaii, and to Americans as a whole. This side of Sparky's life is well documented, people who never knew Sparky in person will always have the record of his accomplishments by which to remember him. I therefore would like to take this opportunity to address a more personal side of Sparky that I was very fortunate to be able to share.

Sparky was a very close friend of mine, sometimes I think that anyone who knew Sparky, and there are many, became a very close friend. Sparky always made the extra effort to ensure that the people around him shared in his warmth and friendship. This was a man who dedicated himself to working toward the betterment of the lives of so many. His passion and his undaunted dedication to the principles of humanity set Sparky's accomplishments apart from those of lesser motivations.

Senator MATSUNAGA'S term here in the Senate was marked not only by legislative accomplishements but also as one that directly involved the people of Hawaii who Sparky represented so well. Sparky knew only too well how far his office was from Hawaii. However, once a constituent made the journey to the Hart Building and sought out Sparky they were treated as special guests of the Senate. Anything else would have been unthinkable to Sparky. In my mind Senator MATSUNAGA will always occupy a special place at that table in the center of the Senate dining room surrounded as he so often was by smiling constituents.

It is not easy to stand on the floor of this Senate and talk about how much someone will be missed. It is particularly hard because Sparky was much more than a colleague; he was a close friend of myself and my family. When Sparky lived in Bethesda and Nancy and I lived in Rockville, Nancy would often drive in with Sparky's wife Helene and trade stories about our families. Nancy and I would like to extend our greatest condolences to the Matsunaga family. Through Helene we became closer friends because we shared so many experiences dealing with children and grandchildren. That closeness makes their loss particularly close to our hearts. Our thoughts go out to Helene, her friendship through the years has been very important to us, we wish her the best.

Sparky will be sorely missed. I know that the friendship and warmth he gave us will never be forgotten. His contribution to the lives of everyone here will live on; a lasting tribute to a truly great man.

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IA, STUDENTS FIGHT AGAINST DRUGS

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I rise with pride to commend a fine group of students from Council Bluffs, IA, who participate in the drug awareness and reduction education program there.

They have come to Washington by schoolbus today to present to the Congress a petition that requests funding to fight against drug use and to increase the awareness of the drug problem in the Nation's heartland.

The students are the best example I know of how to defeat the death grip that drugs seem to have on our society—by individual action that assumes responsibility for the consequences of their actions and that assumes responsibility for the condition of their own communities.

These young American leaders know the danger and threat that drugs pose—they have seen the destruction up close.

They did not need someone from Washington to inspire them.

On their own initiative they have chosen to turn away from the allure of drugs. And they have decided to be an example to their friends who still may be using drugs.

Since they have firsthand experience of the drug problem in America's heartland—the young women and men of Council Bluffs remind us—as I have informed my colleagues many times—that drug abuse is not confined to our inner cities.

These young people manifest what I have been saying for quite some time: The war on drugs must be fought—and ultimately won—on the battleground of values.

The best antidrug program is still strong families, strong schools, and strong churches.

Because no Government program can match the moral power and persuasion of strong nongovernmental institutions.

However, all of us recognize that families in many neighborhoods and communities are under siege because of the scourge of drugs in their midst.

Certainly, Government cannot replace the family. But it can provide basic protection and resources necessary to sustain families—especially the neediest among us—as a bulwark against drugs.

And Government can provide individuals and society as a whole moral leadership by maintaining a standard of right and wrong conduct—manifested by laws and policies that make it clear and unambiguous that drug use is wrong and it must stop.

I know these young Iowans will all agree:

We can pass all the laws to fight illegal drugs we want.

We can implement all the policies against drug use we want.

However—if these policies and laws are not grounded in the people's commitment to fight drugs and their use, the laws and policies will be impotent.

That is why these young leaders are such a vital link in our fight against drugs. And that is why the efforts represented here today are so heartening and welcomed.

They are the ones who are able to reach out to their friends and other youth around them.

By taking a public stand against drug use, they are setting examples through their actions and educating their peers.

I believe they offer an invaluable influence in drug-use prevention.

It is through such outstanding efforts as represented by the students from Council Bluffs, IA, that will enable us to succeed in the war against drugs.

Again, I commend them for their invaluable contribution. Not only for the good of Iowa, but for the good of the whole Nation.

I am grateful, I am proud to represent them in the U.S. Senate, and I want them to know that they have my full support.

IMMIGRATION-RELATED DISCRIMINATION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, almost 1 month ago, the General Accounting Office released its final status report on the implementation of the employer sanctions provisions of the 1986 Immigration Act.

The report confirms exactly what many of us in Congress feared when employer sanctions were enacted in 1986—that they would produce discrimination against Hispanic American citizens, Asian-American citizens, and other ethnic minorities and legal immigrants.

The findings of the General Accounting Office are startling. The GAO conducted exhaustive employer surveys and concluded that fully 19 percent of employers have initiated illegal, discriminatory practices as a result of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986. Ten percent of employers were engaged in national origins discrimination, and another 9 percent discriminated against job applicants based on their immigration status. The number of American citizens and legal immigrants wrongfully denied employment as a result must number in the thousands.

Clearly, this situation is intolerable, and it remains my position that employer sanctions should be repealed. The enforcement benefits of employer sanctions are not justifiable if they are at the expense of ethnic Americans who face new discrimination hurdles in their effforts to gain a job for which they are qualified.

So unless Congress finds a way to end this discrimination, the sanctions should be repealed.

The specific terms of the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 required the Comptroller General to make a determination whether "a widespread pattern of discrimination has resulted against citizens or nationals of the United States or against eligible workers seeking employment solely from the implementation" of employer sanctions. The law stated that if the Comptroller General makes that determination, then Congress has 30 days to consider a joint resolution approving his findings. If that resolution is signed by the President, the employer sanctions provisions are terminated.

The Comptroller General made that determination in his latest report, and on March 29 I introduced a joint resolution triggering the procedures to terminate sanctions.

I offered the original amendment creating this expedited procedure in the 1986 act in order to guarantee that Congress could act if discrimination developed.

Unfortunately, I believe congressional sentiment at this time is not to vote on repealing employer sanctions, but to try to reform them first before any repeal is found necessary. Therefore, it is my intention to pursue other remedies—to seek to address this alarming discrimination through a series of aggressive approaches.

Over the coming few days, I will be developing a working bill of tough immigration antidiscrimination measures which I believe should be considered by Congress as expeditiously as possible.

And, in addition, the Attorney General has designated Assistant Attorney General John Dunne, who heads the Civil Rights Division of the Justice Department, to chair a joint task force on immigration-related discrimination. In a hearing I chaired last week in the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Dunne indicated that the task force should present its recommendations to Congress within 120 days.

A number of remedial steps can be undertaken immediately through administrative action, and I have shared these with the Attorney General's task force. These include increased public education, establishing field offices for the Office of Special Counsel for Immigration-Related Unfair Employment Practices, reducing the confusing plethora of documents with which employers must contend, and involving the Department of Labor much more heavily in the employer education and enforcement process.

In addition, I believe we must address the scope of the discrimination coverage, bringing it more in line with practices under other civil rights laws. This would include, for example, permitting agricultural workers to be protected against discrimination, as well as permitting private rights of action and attorneys fees consistent with other long-standing civil rights statutes.

Finally, Mr. President, all of these steps will take time. In the interim, rather than repeal employer sanctions, I believe there should be a moratorium on enforcement while new employer education and other remedies take effect. Congress should act to establish such a moratorium if the Attorney General is unwilling to suspend enforcement for a period.

Discrimination in the enforcement of employer sanctions or any other aspect of the immigration law is intolerable. We should work urgently and vigorously to take every step possible to remedy this widespread discrimination, while continuing to hold out the prospect of repealing employer sanctions if that mission fails.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the letter I have sent to Assistant Attorney General Dunne, as chairman of the Joint Task Force, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY,
Washington, DC, April 25, 1990.

Mr. JOHN R. DUNNE,
Chairman, Attorney General's Joint Task Force, Department of Justice, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. DUNNE: We appreciate your testimony and participation in the Committee's hearing last Friday to review the important issues raised by the Comptroller General's report on discrimination resulting from the implementation of employer sanctions. We look forward to working with you and the members of the Joint Task Force in dealing with the serious and urgent discrimination problems raised in the GAO report.

As I suggested to you at the hearing, I believe there are a number of both administrative as well as legislative remedies we should consider in responding to the GAO report—all necessary if we are to significantly reform employer sanctions and end the unintended discrimination that has resulted with their implementation. If we cannot achieve these essential reforms within a reasonable period of time, then we must consider repealing employer sanctions.

I listed some of them at the hearing, but I wanted to take this opportunity to follow-up in greater detail, and to formally bring these proposals to the attention of the Joint Task Force as it begins its review of the GAO report.

First, there are a number of administrative actions that can be taken now, under existing law, if the necessary regulatory actions and funding requirements are met. For example, the GAO found that employers' understanding of the 1986 immigration law actually decreased over the past three years. The obvious response to this is to dramatically increase public education programs beyond those currently sponsored by the Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) and the Office of Special Counsel. This would suggest that the Administration should consider utilizing and funding other relevant agencies of government to expand a public education campaign—such as the Department of Labor and its field offices throughout the country, State employment agencies, the EEOC, among others.

There is wide agreement that the Office of the Special Counsel should establish field offices in light of the GAO finding that discrimination is most prevalent in California and Texas. This can be accomplished through administration action; if additional funding is required, I am confident Congress will be forthcoming.

The Administration can also implement part of the GAO's recommendation on reducing the number of documents by immediately promulgating regulations to reduce them to five or less while the Joint Task Force considers the larger, and longer-term question of establishing a single fraud-resistent and uniform employment eligibility system.

In addition, INS can immediately act to bring a greater degree of uniformity in its application and enforcement of employer sanctions. A number of enforcement related proposals have been brought to the attention of INS Commissioner Gene McNary, and they can all be implemented now, during the course of the Joint Task Force's review.

Also, more generally, in the area of administrative reform, I believe a far larger and continuning role must be played by the Department of Labor in the enforcement and fashioning of employer sanctions policy. In many respects, a law aimed at allowing only eligible workers to find and keep a job in America's workplace—the goal of employer sanctions—is really a labor law as much as it is an immigration issue. In hindsight, it was probably a mistake for the 1986 Act to give the Department of Justice and INS the sole responsibility for implementing a labor-related law. Unlike the Department of Labor, which has a well recognized and long established (and accepted) role in the American workplace, INS has had little or no experience with employers or in enforcing labor laws. Outside of the Southwest, most employers, as well as workers, consider it odd that INS, viewed as a border/immigration control force should be involved in enforcing workplace regulations and laws.

Perhaps the time has come to seriously consider shifting the primacy of employer sanctions enforcement from INS to the Department of Labor. It has regional and field offices across the country already enforcing and monitoring labor laws and workplace conditions. Until the law can be changed to accomplish this (if it is judged desireable by the Joint Task Force and Congress)—Department of Labor inspectors should at least be deputized by the Attorney General to enforce employer sanctions during the course of their ongoing workplace enforcement activities.

Finally, on issues requiring legislative action—beyond the need to provide additional authorization or appropriations—there are basically two areas that need particular attention. The first has been highlighted by Senator Simpson in his bill—and that is the question of developing a fraud-resistent care or system for determining employment eligibility in the United States—with all the underlying documentation and administrative problems, and questions of privacy, which that will entail.

While I have serious reservations about proceeding to a national identification card,

I nonetheless believe that this is a proper subject for review by the Joint Task Force.

The second area is how we can strengthen the anti-discrimination provisions of current law. I believe we must expand the scope and effectiveness of the anti-discrimination provisions of the immigration law, to make it comparable to our other anit-discrimination laws as it relates to coverage, terms and conditions of employment, private right of action, remedies and penalties and attorney's fees.

We hope you will look closely at both of these important areas of concern, which were also a principal focus of the GAO's findings and recommendations.

Again, we are pleased the Attorney General has now constituted the Joint Task Force and that it has begun its work. We were gratified at your pledge to report to Congress on your review of the GAO report within 120 days, and we look forward to working with you to accomplish this goal. In the meantime, we hope that you, your colleagues in the Department of Justice, and at INS, will consider taking some of the remedial administrative actions outlined here, even before the Joint Task Force recommends longer-term legislative reforms.

Many thanks for your consideration, and I am taking the liberty of sharing this letter with Secretary of Labor Elizabeth Dole, and INS Commissioner Gene McNary. With best wishes,

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. KENNEDY,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Affairs.

THE DEATH OF SENATOR SPARK M. MATSUNAGA

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I rise today to express my deep sorrow on hearing about the death of my colleague, Senator Spark M. Matsunaga. Mr. President, among his colleagues he was known as "Sparky." Senator Matsunaga served in the Congress 27 years; 13 of those years he served here in the Senate as a Member of the Senate Finance Committee, the Veterans' Affairs Committee and the Labor and Human Resources Committee. He was a popular man here in the Senate and at home where he won his last two Senate races with 80 percent and 76 percent of the popular vote.

One of his greatest achievements in the Senate was gaining passage in the 100th Congress of a law redressing the injustices felt by west coast Japanese-Americans whose patriotism had been questioned and who were interned in camps during World War II.

Spark Masayaki Matsunaga was born in Kukuiula, on the island of Kauai, HI, to parents who had emigrated from Japan. He graduated with honors from the University of Hawaii with a degree in education in 1941. Upon the outbreak of World War II, he joined the Army's all Nisei 100th Battalion of the 442d Regimental Combat Team. Serving in Italy, that regiment became one of the most heavily decorated and famous units in the history of the Army. While fighting on Italian invasion beaches, Senator Matsunaga earned the Bronze Star medal and two Purple Hearts.

After the war, Senator Matsunaga recovered from his wounds and worked for the Interior Department and the War Assets Administration. In 1951, he graduated from Harvard University Law School. He was an assistant prosecutor in Honolulu from 1952 to 1954, then had a private law practice until 1963.

He was a member of the territorial House of Representatives from 1956 to 1959, serving as majority leader in 1959. After 14 years in the U.S. House of Representatives, he successfully ran for the Senate in 1976 to succeed Republican Hiram Fong, who was retiring.

Senator Matsunaga was an example of a true gentleman indeed. Soft spoken, he always greeted us warmly and treated the public and his constituents with the utmost respect and friendliness. Every time a group of constituents visited his Washington office, the group would be given a tour of the Capitol by one of his staff members and the tour ended in the Senate dining room where they dined as guests of the Senator. He liked being teased about how he was always "center stage" in this famous dining room.

I will surely miss my colleague as will all the Members of the Senate. My sympathy goes out to his family and friends here and in Hawaii. Senator Matsunaga will always be in our hearts and minds as we debate issues here in the Senate which he championed during the years he served as a U.S. Senator from the great State of Hawaii.

KEYNOTE ADDRESS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL DICK THORNBURGH AT VIRGINIA SUMMIT ON DRUGS

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, in the next fiscal year, the Federal Government will spend over $10.6 billion nationwide in support of the National Drug Control Strategy. About one-fourth of that will go to directly support the State and local antidrug activities. The Commonwealth of Virginia will receive over $9.2 million in grants from the Department of Justice this fiscal year, over three times the $2.7 million the State received in 1989. One of the main goals of the Justice Department is to disrupt and destroy all the drug trafficking organizations. The Department of Justice has been successful so far of seizing and forfeiting immense profits and proceeds derived from the drug traffickers. In order for the National Drug Control Strategy to be successful, and for us to beat the drug traffickers, there will be a need for more cooperation among the Federal, State, and local branches of government.

Mr. President, I recently attended the Virginia Summit on Drugs banquet where Attorney General Dick Thornburgh gave an enlightening presentation on the specific resources and initiatives the Commonwealth of Virginia has used in combating the war on drugs. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the entire text of the Attorney General's statement at the banquet be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"THE WAR ON DRUGS: A VIEW TO VIRGINIA'S SUMMIT"

(Keynote address by Dick Thornburgh, Attorney General, at the Virginia Summit on Drugs Banquet, Apr. 16, 1990)

I am honored to join you this evening at this Virginia Summit on Drugs, especially to salute those of you in law enforcement for the brave part you are playing in the war on drugs. You have faced rough duty out there on the streets, I am well aware, and have fought your way up some steep slopes—to reach this summit. I want to pay you sincere tribute, as we look together at the real nature of those crimes that go hand-in-hand with drugs—the dirty hand which clasps the bloody hand, together forming the death grip of the drug abuser and the drug trafficker.

Increasingly, these days we are hearing naive talk about drug-abuse as "a victimless crime." We hear pundits, professors, and even judges, learnedly proposing to legalize drugs. What does this talk constitute but just the opposite of street smarts? Call it, I say, street ignorance. For it ignores the lessons of the street and indicates we still have a job to do to make people recognize the true risks that are associated with drugs.

Drugs are not a victimless crime. Far from it. Consider the risks to the institutions which undergird our society and values: families, schools, businesses, even our system of democracy itself. Not to mention the enormous costs that must be borne—eventually—by every citizen and taxpayer.

In the next fiscal year, the federal government will spend over $10.6 billion nationwide in support of our National Drug Control Strategy. About one fourth of that will go to directly support state and local antidrug activities. Virginia will receive over $9.2 million in grants from our Department of Justice alone, over three times the $2.7 million you received in 1989. But even with such funding, how can you ever "offset" what drugs have already done to the families of substance abusers? How can you ever "recover" the terrible cost to the children of drug addicts—especially those babies who enter into the world thrashing, trying to shake the shackles of a crack addiction they were born with?

Drugs a victimless crime? Think about the level of violence and homicide that attends that current crime wave, and then recall that well over half of those arrested for non-drug felonies test positive for drugs. With every drug purcahse, whether its made on some dark urban street corner or behind a rustic rural barn, that transactions represents that last stage in a criminal business enterprise that, in terms of production, marketing, and distribution, rivals the most efficient of legitimate, multinational consumer businesses. That one drug purchase—and hundreds of thousands like it—support a network of multinational criminal conglomerates, who not only contribute to our domestic strife and the dissolution of our communities, but who also threaten the very democracies of our South American allies.

A victimless crime? The National Transportation Safety Board reported earlier this year that 33 percent of the truck drivers killed last year were impaired by drugs and alcohol, exposing countless other drug-free drivers to the risk of accident, injury, or death.

Those are only some of the risks, and each of you here knows of many others.

But what of responsibility? Who must face up to the daunting challenge of facing down drug abusers and drug traffickers. Everyone turns first, of course, to Uncle Sam. One of the most famous of fables is, "I'm from the federal govenment and I'm here to help." We are here to help, but it's no accident that President Bush's strategy is called a National Drug Control Strategy, not a federal one.

Yes, your federal government does have an important role to play in the war on drugs. Because, clearly, from just the law enforcement perspective alone there are some things that only the federal government can do: such as working across state lines and in other countries with our foreign counterparts, creating national and international intelligence networks, and dismantling the upper-most echelons of major criminal drug trafficking enterprises.

In the next few moments I'd like to highlight for you some of the major areas where we will be focusing the federal effort. It will quickly become apparent that there is a role here for everyone, and I'm not speaking just about government and its institutions. We must count on the unqualified support of many disciplines throughout American society: business, education, health care, and perhaps, most important, parents and individual citizens. We must all do our part. And we must work together, as true partners, if we're going to make a difference.

From a law enforcement perspective, our responsibility is to disrupt, dismantle, and destroy drug trafficking enterprises. This ambitious agenda reaches across the full spectrum of drug activity. We intend to disrupt the drug marketplace by displacing sellers and users alike. We intend to dismantle drug trafficking organizations by incapacitating their leadership.

And, most important, we intend to destroy the very infrastructure of these criminal conglomerates by seizing and forfeiting the immense profits and proceeds derived from their illegal activities. Recently, for example, we seized over $90 million dollars of the drug assets of just one of the major Colombian kingpins, stashed in four different countries. We're also going after the illegal income of General Noriega and other narcotraffickers.

As the President's National Drug Control Strategy emphasizes, there is a progression in our partnership efforts to fight the drug problem. Realistically, most of the enforcement activity directed toward the street drug user will come from the local and municipal levels of law enforcement.

But as we collectively direct our enforcement efforts further up the trafficking chain away from the purchaser to the retail sellers, to the mid-level distributors, and to the wholesalers, there is a need for increasingly more cooperation among the federal, state, and local branches of government. Many of these efforts result from informal arrangements with two or more police departments working together against a common target. But still other enforcement endeavors are the result of longstanding, established interagency cooperation.

One of the most successful of these initiatives has been and continues to be the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Forces. The President's Drug Strategy recognizes these task forces for what they are—a model of effective, intergovernmental cooperation dedicated to dismantling organized drug networks at the highest possible level. This program will realize major resource enhancements next year—increases that will provide for more federal investigators and prosecutors, as well as support staff, across the country.

These Task Forces capitalize on the skills of nine separate federal agencies, including the DEA, FBI, and IRS, as well as significant support from state and local agencies.

In fact, I want to applaud one major success you've recently scored here in Virginia, through the Task Force under U.S. Attorney Henry E. Hudson. That is the OCDEFT undercover operation that dismantled the Tabar Organization. Amin J. "Amir" Tabar once worked for the Iranian embassy, but abruptly changed careers in 1987, and spent the next two years drug-trafficking in the DC/Northern Virginia-Maryland market. He will now spend the next twenty years in prison without prospect of parole.

Amir Tabar was convicted of trafficking in drugs from two continents. He orchestrated the smuggling of heroin and opium from Iran and handled shipments of cocaine from Mexico. His organization, with some fifty employees, did at least $5 million worth of drug-dealing through three Virginia used car dealerships. But no more.

Earlier I mentioned that one of our goals is to destroy the very financial infrastructure of these criminal drug enterprises. Experience has taught us that as important as it is to convict and imprison the drug kingpins, they are often replaceable. But, when we seize and forfeit their cash, their cars, their boats, their planes, their houses—and even their satellite dishes—these crime syndicates can't go on.

Nationwide, our forfeitures exceeded a half billion dollars last year—$160 million of which was turned back to cooperating state and local agencies.

Just as was done in the Tabar Case. Not only did we see a significant sentence imposed, but I'm pleased to report that we were able to seize and forfeit over one million dollars in assets—a quarter of a million in cash, real estate and sixteen cars.

I am also pleased to report that the three Arlington, Virginia police officers who took part in this undercover operation earned their department an equitable share in the Tabar forfeiture—$74,000. Appropriately, the moneys have been used to purchase Glock 9-millimeter pistols for all Arlington police officers, upgrading their protective firepower to help match the deadly weaponry of the drug-dealers.

We are forgoing other new partnerships as well. In Virginia you are fortunate to have two excellent Law Enforcement Coordinating Committees, directed by two fine LECC Coordinators in our U.S. Attorneys' offices: Sharon "Sam" Dibbley in the Eastern District, and Betty Fitzgerald in the Western District. Out of Alexandria, for example, Sam Dibbley has been staffing conferences for state and local law enforcement officials—on search and seizure warrants, drug-demand reduction, and asset forfeiture—thus recycling the experience gained back into more effective law enforcement.

The LECCs have also embarked on special partnership programs within the community. In two progressive outreach efforts to target the profits and proceeds of drug trafficking, the U.S. Attorney's Offices and federal agents are meeting with representatives of the banking and financial communities to provide them with an overview of money laundering and their role and responsibilities in curbing this criminal activity.

I hope that by mentioning just these few ways in which we are trying to attack the drug problem within our communities, you'll get some ideas of how you can work through existing channels or identify which new channels need forging.

I'd like to turn from American states like Virginia for a moment and focus on another America—Latin America—as it relates to our international endeavors. As you know, President Bush met recently with the Presidents of Bolivia, Colombia, and Peru to arrive at ways in which cooperation can be enhanced to strengthen comprehensive assaults against the production, trafficking, and consumption of illegal drugs. The United States is already committed to providing military surveillance, law enforcement, and economic assistance to these Andean nations. And, although our South American neighbors have demonstrated tremendous will, resolve alone is insufficient. They need our help—our resources as well as our moral support.

That is why I am leaving on Wednesday to chair our delegation to the special meeting of law enforcement leaders from the Organization of American States—the top police and prosecutors from 27 western Hemisphere nations. We will convene for three days in Ixtapa, Mexico, to map out specific ways in which we can work together to truly make the whole of our hemispheric effort more than the just sum of its parts.

At the top of our list, I will be urging all member nations of the OAS to ratify the United Nations Drug Enforcement Convention. We in the United States were one of the first nations to join this important undertaking to enhance law enforcement efforts worldwide. Over 100 nations drafted this new drug fighting treaty, which I was privileged to sign on our behalf in late 1988, in Vienna.

When fully implemented, this compact will establish a truly international network of cooperation unparalleled in law enforcement history. We can look forward to the day when bank secrecy laws no longer lead to dead ends. We can look forward to the day when, aided by mutual legal assistance treaties and obligations to extradite international drug felons, we can promise these nefarious crooks that there will be no safe havens. And we can look forward to the day when asset-forfeiture laws will have a worldwide reach into the rich coffers and deep pockets of the drug lords.

Events of the past year in our hemisphere can give us many reasons for hope. The level of enforcement activity in Colombia is unprecedented. Not only has President Virgilio Barco stood firm in the face of the assaults of the narco-trafficantes; he also showed his courage and mettle in extraditing by decree some 15 of their nationals to the United States to stand trial for drug trafficking violations.

No less exciting has been the end to the tyranny in Panama, whose self-declared ruler now awaits trial in Florida for drug trafficking. And the conviction and sentencing in Mexico of a number of persons, including Raphael Caro Quintero and Ernesto Fonseca Carrillo, who were responsible for the murder of DEA Special Agent Kiki Camarena.

These tales are every bit as exciting as Tom Clancy's "Clear and Present Danger," but they're a true testament to that special courage of narcotics officers everywhere in the world, beginning here at home.

Let there be no mistake. We all yearn for what President Bush has described as a kinder and gentler America. But we also recognize that, in order to achieve a kinder and gentler nation for all Americans, we're going to have to get rougher and tougher with some Americans—those involved in drug trafficking and the violence it inevitably spawns. Those who choose to violate our laws must, and will, be held responsible, and that's a job for all of us in law enforcement.

But this war won't be won by you committed men and women who police our streets and communities—alone. And it won't be own by soldiers in the Andean mountains—alone. The war on drugs will only be won when all of our citizens are enlisted as foot soldiers. When all of our citizens recognize the threat of drugs, and when all are prepared to do something about it—to help restore the sense of values which rules out drug dependency as an acceptable life style.

True, law enforcement solutions alone will never solve the drug problem. We must also reduce the demand for drugs. We must provide more and better programs of prevention, education, rehabilitation and treatment. But, all the while, we must keep up a sustained law enforcement effort.

In all of these efforts, our goal must be clear. It is an America—and a world—where "pot" once again means a useful cooking utensil, where "crack" is the sound of a baseball hitting a bat, where "grass" is something to mow, not to smoke, and where "heroin(e)" means a Helen Keller, A Christa McAulifee, A Sandra Day O'Connor and yes, a Barbara Bush.

That is a goal toward which we all can, and should, persevere. Thank you.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, has morning business been closed?

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The period for morning business is now closed.

DIRE EMERGENCY SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of H.R. 4404, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 4404) making dire emergency supplemental appropriations for disaster assistance, food stamps, unemployment compensation administration, and other urgent needs, and transfers, and reducing funds budgeted for military spending for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1990, and for other purposes.

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

COMMITTEE AMENDMENT BEGINNING ON PAGE 2, LINE 11

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is committee amendment No. 1 which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 2, beginning on line 11 insert new language as follows:

For additional expenses to meet the present emergency needs for "General expenses," $15,000,000, to remain available until expended.

Mr. HATFIELD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, like our distinguished chairman, Senator BYRD, who made a statement last night in anticipation of this bill being laid down now, the Committee on Appropriations has moved this bill to the floor for this point of time, and we had some very spirited debate in the committee on various and sundry issues within this bill.

I might comment that the original dire emergency supplemental bill was primarily concerned with aid to Nicaragua and to Panama. And as you see in this bill print now, that issue is no longer the sole or main issue within the supplemental, because it has been joined by a number of other very important matters and policies of pressing concern, all of which deserve the careful, though I would say expeditious, hearing, and consideration here today.

I remind my colleagues on this side of the aisle, especially, that deficit neutrality will characterize all successful attempts to amend this supplemental appropriation bill. If an amendment is urgent enough to be considered at this time on the floor, it certainly then has to be important enough to merit the appropriate offset from another part of the measure.

We urge this not because of any policy of the committee, but by the Budget Act itself, which we are functioning under and to give this bill an opportunity to move to conference at the soonest date possible. We must move this bill. To that end, I hope that our debate today will be not only purposeful, but I hope it will be very brief.

I join with our chairman in offering this bill at this time as the best judgment and consensus of the committee. I also want to comment that I find over my tenure of service on the Appropriations Committee, the appropriations process has become more difficult and more difficult. That is because, in part, that we have strayed far from the matters relating only to appropriating money for providing the support to these various programs and agencies. We have increasingly found the appropriation vehicle as the vehicle to resolve all other unresolved issues and matters not of appropriation character, but of policy character, that should more purposefully move through the authorizing committees.

I want to, at some time, make a study on how many hours we have debated on this floor on an appropriation bill when it was not an appropriation matter. I would venture a guess, Mr. President, that we have spent more hours on this floor debating issues not under the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee than we have in debating the substantive matters within the appropriation bill, as it relates to the appropriations process.

These admonitions have been issued many times before, but I want to merely use them again as a point to say that the chairman of the committee, which has 29 members and is the largest committee of any committee of the Senate, 16 Democrats and 13 Republicans, and when you view the members within their respective party designation and you find the full range of political philosophy expressed and represented, it is no longer just a question of Democrat and Republican. It becomes a question of philosophy.

The chairman is really a maestro orchestrating a great symphony to keep the discorded notes out and harmonious notes in. It becomes increasingly difficult bearing upon the role and responsibility of the chairman.

The chairman and I have worked closely together over a period of years, and I am proud of that relationship, that working relationship, because it is undergirded by a sense of friendship and warm affection. The chairman and I do not agree on every issue, any more than any of my friends on this side of the aisle agree on all issues. For that matter, my wife does not agree with me on a lot of political issues.

That is not the point. The point is that we have this harmonious, wonderful, working relationship, and we have diversity within the committee, and that is part of the great pluralism of our society and of our democracy, which now we find our friends over in Eastern Europe trying to emulate, to get diversity, pluralism, rather than a monolithic, myopic thing.

I want to commend the chairman, again, for a marvelous performance in putting together controversial, very important issues, that have very distinctive viewpoints from the colleagues on the committee, and I am sure will be reflected here again on the floor.

Mr. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

Mr. BYRD. I thank the very distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD] for his generous remarks, and I can return them in kind and in double measure.

I have served under several chairmen of the Appropriations Committee in my 32 years in the Senate: First, under Senator Hayden, who was the chairman of the Appropriations Committee when I came here, Carl Hayden; and Senator Richard B. Russell; and Senator Ellender; Senator McClellan; Senator Magnuson; Senator HATFIELD, and Senator Stennis.

So I have had excellent tutoring all along the way during the 32 years. They have all been excellent chairmen. We have a fine committee. It does compose 29 percent of the total Senate, and I have been favorably blessed by having worked with him as my teammate, worked in tandem with me, and always with the underlying basic solid friendship that is there and that exists between Senator HATFIELD and me.

He is a decent, fine person, and at all times he has given me help and cooperation and encouragement. It is true that we do not agree on some matters. That could not be expected of any two persons anywhere, at any time, and certainly over a period of time; and I could not be more fortunate in having as the ranking Republican member on that committee, Senator MARK HATFIELD.

I respect him, I admire him, and I am very fond of him.

Faithful are the wounded friends, and I consider MARK HATFIELD my friend. I hope he does not carry any wounds as a consequence of that, but I am proud of the association I have with him as a working team on that committee.

Mr. President, I am going to make a statement. I see the distinguished Republican leader on the floor. Does he wish to ask a question of me prior to my proceeding? I will be happy to accommodate him.

(Mr. KOHL assumed the chair.)

Mr. DOLE. If I might just address a question to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee. I know that after the statement there will probably be a major amendment by the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JOHNSTON].

I inquire of the distinguished chairman. I have an amendment I do not believe will be controversial. I have not had an opportunity to discuss it personally with the chairman. We have discussed it with the staff. It would appropriate $5 million for relief of earthquake victims in the country of Armenia. As the chairman knows, we had—I will not say a bitter debate—we had a good debate on the history. There was a devastating earthquake in December 1988 and there were 30,000 to 50,000 people killed there, a half million people homeless in a country of 4 million, a half million homeless.

I do not mean the amendment is controversial.

I have to be absent from the Senate from about 12 to 1 p.m. I am wondering if I might be able, after laying down the major amendment, to offer my amendment if I can work it out with the chairman and with the ranking member.

Mr. BYRD. The distinguished Republican leader will certainly have no problem with me in that regard. Senator LEAHY, the chairman of the subcommittee, is presently examining the amendment, and I will know when I hear from him as to what his reaction will be. Personally, I have no problem with it. I will be happy to support it. I will certainly step aside for the Republican leader to offer his amendment whenever it is convenient for him. I want it to be at his convenience.

Mr. DOLE. I do not want to interrupt a major amendment. I have discussed the amendment with Senator HATFIELD's staff and with Senator KASTEN personally on this side.

I agree that Senator LEAHY should have an opportunity to look at it and clear it before any action is taken. I did want to indicate, I understand there is about that much money that has not been allocated. If I do not offer it earlier, I am certain someone else will discover that and they will be here ahead of me. I do think this is certainly a meritorious cause.

Compared to other industrialized nations, I think we can say, without any satisfaction, the U.S. contribution has been minimal. Most of it has been transportation of food supplies and the expense of that to the Defense Department.

We have had millions of dollars privately donated to the Soviet Armenian Republic and this money would go to non-governmental organizations, again given directly to the Soviet Union.

I would say, having visited Soviet Armenia, if you want to go to a place that will make you cry, you visit some of the homes or you visit the school, which was devastated, and 400 young children wiped out in 40 seconds. While you are standing there the mothers come out of these little tin shacks and talk about the tragedy. That should not itself justify assistance.

In the history of this country we have been responsive to tragedies and certainly this was significant international calamity.

I thank the distinguished chairman and the ranking member, Senator HATFIELD.

Mr. BYRD. May I again say that the distinguished chairman, Mr. LEAHY, is looking over the amendment. I would certainly be happy to support it. As a matter of fact, I would like to be a cosponsor of it. I do not ask to be, because this is the amendment of the distinguished Republican leader. I do not want to in any way attempt to press my name in connection with it. But I am 100 percent with him in sympathy for those Armenians who suffered from the earthquake, and I just cite I will be happy to be a cosponsor with the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. I would say the amendment is being offered by myself and Senator LEVIN. I would be very pleased to have the distinguished chairman to be the lead sponsor of the amendment.

Mr. BYRD. I would not presume to take that leadership from the Senator. He is the leader and I would be happy just to join with him if he would like.

Mr. DOLE. I see the subcommittee chairman, Senator LEAHY, is on the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. LEAHY], and retain my rights to the floor, for the purpose of his responding to the Republican leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I have been up in the meeting of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, and I apologize to the chairman. I just came down here. I have an understanding, Mr. President, that the distinguished Senator from West Virginia retains his right to the floor.

If I might ask the distinguished Senator from Kansas if he could just quickly summarize his amendment. I understand it is for $5 million, is that correct?

Mr. DOLE. It is an amendment offered by myself and the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. LEVIN] and I believe, to acknowledge the cosponsorship of the chairman of the committee, Senator BYRD, and the ranking member, Senator HATFIELD. What it does is make available nongovernmental funds for humanitarian relief, transportation, materials provided for such relief, medical treatment, education, vocational training, to the victims of the Armenian earthquake of December 7, 1988.

As I was indicating to Senator BYRD, I have had an opportunity to visit Soviet Armenia and to see the devastation and point out there were 30,000 to 50,000 Armenians killed in this earthquake. There are up to 400,000 to 500,000 homeless in a country of about 4 million people. I point out that we have as a Nation been rather at the bottom of the list on support we have given to the victims of the earthquake.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I recall the visit the distinguished Republican leader made to Armenia. I applaud his own efforts in going there. I think his going there helped call attention not only in this country but in other countries the terrible suffering caused by that earthquake. I also recall not only talking with the distinguished leader when he came back and knowing how deeply he felt about it, but also seeing the pictures that were on the news.

I do not think any one of us in our own experience in this country or elsewhere could envision something as terrible as what the distinguished leader saw when he was there.

I would note that in the fiscal 1990 foreign operations appropriations bill we did provide $5 million to assist those Armenian earthquake victims, which was recommended by the distinguished Senator from Kansas. I supported the inclusion of that $5 million and was strongly in favor of it.

I support this amendment to send additional aid to the earthquake victims in Armenia. I think it is in the best traditions of the American people. However, I am concerned about reports that the private voluntary organizations that are responsible for using these funds have had difficulty getting started there. I want to help but will this money get to the people in need?

Mr. DOLE. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEAHY. Of course.

Mr. DOLE. I agree in part with what the Senator from Vermont has indicated. But we have been in touch with AID, and they just had a team there and they reported back. They are now prepared to spend out the money. They are getting applications which are going to be far in excess of the $5 million.

I agree, as in any other case, if we get the Federal Government involved, it moves very slowly. But the AID mission has been there. We have been in touch with the group; they have indicated they are going to begin to spend that.

In addition, at Senator LEVIN's request we added transportation, which is one of the biggest bottlenecks in the Soviet Armenian Republic. We think that will require considerable additional money.

I know my friend from Vermont is sympathetic to this cause. If there is no disagreement, if we could adopt the amendment, I would be prepared to say this: If by day's end, or whenever we complete the bill, we have not been satisfied, or the Senator from Vermont has not been satisfied, that the money will be allocated, I will withdraw the amendment at that point.

As I pointed out to the distinguished chairman, I have to be absent from the Senate for about an hour and a half, and I would like to do it now, if I could. I think Senator LEVIN would be happy to come to the floor to make the case on that side. It is not a partisan matter.

I agree with the Senator. If they are not going to spend it, it should not be appropriated. But I think I can assure my colleague that the money will be spent properly through the PVO's, who are now in the process of getting their applications reviewed at AID.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, would this help the distinguished Republican leader? I would assure him that he would be first in line, as far as other Senators are concerned, with his amendment, once we can dispose of my amendment or amendments.

Mr. DOLE. That is fine with me.

Mr. BYRD. There will be a little money left in the outlay figure, and I assure the Senator that I will not let any other amendment come in that would chew into that until he has had a chance. And that would give the Senator from Vermont a little additional time, too.

Mr. DOLE. And I will work with the Senator from Vermont to assure him we are not going to appropriate money that is not going to be expended.

Mr. LEAHY. If the Senator from West Virginia will yield to me?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I will yield.

Mr. LEAHY. As the Senator from Kansas knows, I am very sympathetic to aid to the earthquake victims. Certainly, I do not want to do anything to stop that.

I just want to make sure when we vote it, they will actually get it.

I thank the Senator from West Virginia for yielding.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator and the distinguished Republican leader. I will keep his amendment in mind, and do as I promised.

Mr. President, I wish to review a little of the history of this bill. I do plan to offer an amendment, and I will summarize the amendment before I proceed.

The amendment that I shall send to the desk would reduce the appropriations for aid to Panama from $420 to $300 million.

This $120 million reduction in budget authority yields a reduction in outlays of $63.6 million.

Using the reductions in budget authority and outlays, the amendment would provide additional appropriations, for the following domestic programs: $50 million for Indian health facilities. These funds will enable the Indian Health Service to begin addressing the backlog of sanitation requirements for Indian housing. At the present time, that backlog is estimated to be $650 million, so this would be a good downpayment on that; $50 million, a good downpayment toward the $650 million.

For the Department of Energy, environmental restoration and waste management activities. These funds that I would include in my amendment would amount to $200 million. They would be used to accelerate the Department's efforts to clean up the numerous environmental problems at its facilities, at Federal facilities.

We are talking about a massive problem here, something that may equal or, who knows, surpass or come close to the figures that finally will evolve in connection with the savings and loan crisis. We are talking about billions of dollars. But this would be a good step forward, a good downpayment; $200 million.

Third, I would provide $8 million for the Department of Agriculture's Emergency Conservation Program. This additional amount, plus the $10 million already included in the bill, will provide full funding for this disaster program, and it would cover disasters in 21 States, which I will enumerate into the RECORD just a little later, so Senators from those States will know how much the amount will provide to each of their respective States.

Thirteen million dollars for the Soil Conservation Service, salaries and expenses. This appropriation gives the Secretary of Agriculture $13 million to carry out a section of the farm bill providing asisstance to farmers who suffered crop loss as a result of natural disasters.

Twelve million dollars for WIC, special supplemental food program. These funds would be used to provide additional funding to local health clinics to provide supplemental foods to low-income women, infants, and children who are at nutritional risk.

Mr. President, so that Senators may know how much of the $13 million we would give to the States in the special supplemental food program for women, infants, and children, I ask unanimous consent that a table be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, this overall amendment is deficit neutral, so no point of order would lie against it in that respect. It is deficit neutral in that the outlays resulting from the above increases in appropriations are fully offset by the outlay savings resulting from the reduced appropriation in aid to Panama.

The budget authority is within the overall levels allowed in the 1990 budget resolution. Therefore, the amendment is not subject to a Budget Act point of order under section 311(a).

That, in summary, is what the amendment would do. I will be offering the amendment on behalf of myself and Senators JOHNSTON, INOUYE, FORD, and ROCKEFELLER, and would welcome the cosponsorship of any other Senator on either side of the aisle.

Let me review a little of the history of this bill. After the United States intervened in Panama in the overthrow of General Noriega, the President requested $1 billion for that country.

The Congress acted quickly on phase I of that request, $500 million, of which a small amount was for humanitarian aid and a larger amount was for loans to jump-start the Panamanian economy.

In March, after the February 25 election of Mrs. Chamorro as the new President of Nicaragua, the President requested $300 million to aid the new Nicaraguan Government. At the same time he asked for rapid congressional action on the request for Nicaragua and the second half of the request for Panama.

Now here we are ready for Senate consideration of the supplemental. The Senate has passed an authorization bill for these funds for Nicaragua and Panama. The House has appropriated funds for these countries. In addition, the bill also includes funds for other domestic programs that are of extreme importance, including measles outbreak control and Head Start.

Senator LEAHY and I offered an amendment in committee during the markup on this bill earlier this week. Our amendment would have reduced the appropriations for Panama to $300 million, and we would have applied those outlays that would accrue therefrom to various other programs, one of which is Head Start. We were successful in adding $166 million for Head Start. We did not succeed in reducing the figure for Panama from the House figure of $420 million down to $300 million, but we were successful in getting the Head Start money in, $166 million. We were also successful in getting $44 million in for VA medical assistance.

So, in addition, the bill includes funds for domestic programs, such as the one I just mentioned—Head Start. I should say it includes—with respect to the measles outbreak control, we can thank Senator BUMPERS for offering an amendment to add moneys for that program, that very important program, and I am sure we will hear more about that during the debate—the low-income home energy assistance program, disaster assistance, unemployment compensation offices, food stamps and medical care for veterans, which I have already mentioned.

I made it clear, when the bill was marked up in the Appropriations Committee, that I disagreed with the magnitude of the President's request for Panama and Nicaragua. Senator LEAHY, as chairman of the appropriations subcommittee, and I worked together to develop and amendment that would, as I say, have reduced the figure for Panama. I want to pay tribute to Senator LEAHY for his excellent leadership that he has consistently shown in handling this difficult legislation and for his splendid cooperation in working with me on the amendment which we offered the other day in the committee, for his leadership in that regard and for the fine leadership that he demonstrated at the committee meeting and in defense of the amendment.

In carefully examining the President's request, I concluded that, in fact, there was much in his request for both countries, both Nicaragua and Panama, that did not fit the criteria of urgent emergency needs. I do not think the administration justified the $300 million for Nicaragua, but I swallowed by feelings in that regard and went along with the $300 million for Nicaragua.

With respect to Panama, I should say that I do not think it is an emergency to send $30 million to stimulate tourism in Panama. That is part of the administration's request: $30 million to stimulate tourism in Panama. That is something that can wait on the regular bill. We will have a regular bill coming along in a little while, in a few weeks, certainly before the end of the fiscal year, September 30, and we can address additional needs for Panama in that regular bill. We do not have to do it today. We do not have to do it now. It is not all that emergent. Why is $30 million in tourism so emergent for Panama at this moment? Why do we have to have in this bill $30 million for tourism in Panama? I will have a few words to say about the need for appropriations for tourism in West Virginia probably at some point. There are 49 other States that likewise would probably be happy to have some additional moneys for tourism; Vermont, for example. I see the distinguished Senator nodding his head in the affirmative.

I do not think that building $20 million worth of schools in Panama is an emergency. I do not think that has to be in this bill. What about our own schools building in this country? We have school building needs. Why is that a dire emergency right at this moment that we appropriate $20 million for schools in Panama?

I do not think the shelling out of $130 million to pay Panama's debts to the multilateral banks—did all Senators hear what I said? I did not say to pay our debt which as of April 25 was $3,000,361,000,000. That is what we owe and we are paying interest on that amount—$3,000,361,000,000 as of April 25. But the administration suggests that we put in this bill $130 million to pay Panama's debts to the multilateral banks, and that will be added onto the deficit, and we will pay interest on that additional amount in the deficit. We will continue to build up that deficit as we go along like this, and we have to pay interest on it.

So we provide $130 million for Panama to pay off Panama's debts to the multilateral banks, and our children and grandchildren will be paying interest on this massive national debt that has been tripled within the last 10 years. So we are going to hand out $130 million to Panama, and we will continue to pay interest on that $130 million, which is going to be added to the deficit until kingdom come.

I do not think that is necessary in this bill. We have a regular bill coming along. We can take another look at that. Just so Panama can borrow more, I do not think that is an emergency. I think paying our own debts, reducing the deficit, ought to be a higher priority than paying Panama's debts, certainly in this bill.

So I am proposing that Panama receive $300 million in assistance in this bill notwithstanding the language elsewhere which provides $420 million.

The administration has provided acceptable justification only, in my judgment, for $300 million in urgent assistance to revive the Panamanian economy. There is certainly no urgency about contributing $130 million to help Panama pay its back debts to the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. It is going to take months to raise the $600 million for that, and the Appropriations Committee can consider that part of the request in the regular foreign aid bill this fall.

Let me be a bit repetitive here because I think it ought to sink in. There is also no urgency about providing $30 million to develop tourism, $20 million for construction of schools, $6 million for technical assistance, $4 million for scholarships, and $6 million to develop nontraditional exports.

These may well be needed over the long term, but they certainly are not urgently needed to jump-start the Panamanian economy now.

The Appropriations Committee can, and it will consider, additional assistance to Panama should it be justified in only a few short weeks or months.

The amendment includes an additional $21 million for the emergency conservation program under the USDA Stabilization and Conservation Service. The bill currently contains $10 million for that program which is the amount that the House included. However, since the House acted, additional States have identified the need for disaster assistance—since the House acted.

The disasters covered by these funds include floods, tornadoes, brush fires, the earthquake in California, and Hurricane Hugo. The amendment that I am offering on behalf of Senators JOHNSTON, INOUYE, FORD, and ROCKEFELLER would provide full funding for this disaster program. The funds would cover disasters in 21 States. And we will list those States.

For the WIC, special supplemental food program for Women, Infants and Children Program, the amendment includes an additional $12.3 million. This program makes funds available to local health clinics through State departments of health and to Indian tribes to provide supplemental foods to low-income pregnant women, infants, and children up to 5 years of age who are determined by competent medical or nutritional professionals to be at nutritional risk.

As of 1986, only 62 percent of all eligible participants below 100 percent of poverty were served by the WIC program. The Appropriations Committee received a letter signed by 76 Senators—and I hope those 76 Senators are listening and will support this amendment—asking that $2.158 million be appropriated for WIC. However, due to budgetary constraints only $2.16 billion was appropriated.

This amendment will provide an additional $12.3 million and will increase the number of eligible participants that can be served by this program. The amendment also includes an additional $50 million in funds available for Indian sanitation facilities to address critical and basic human health needs. These funds will enable the Indian Health Service to begin addressing the backlog of sanitation requirements for Indian housing. There are not many Indians in my State, but that is an American need.

As I said some time ago when we had considerable debate on the amendment that I offered on behalf of myself and 18 other Senators to the clean air bill, we in West Virginia do not follow rivers and mountains and latitudinal lines to determine where patriotism stops and patriotism begins. Whatever affects Indians in Arizona or New Mexico, or wherever, affects all of us.

These funds will be used to address the highest priority items in the Indian country nationwide. The funds will address fundamental health requirements that most of us take for granted—running water, functional sewer systems, wells, septic tanks, water purification, and the like.

This amendment would also provide $200 million for a new account entitled Environmental Restoration and Waste Management in the Department of Energy. These funds are intended to accelerate the department's efforts to clean up the numerous environmental problems which have been documented at its facilities, especially the weapons production plants.

The department has acknowledged that these problems result from 40 years of inadequate attention. Moses was 40 years leading the Israelites through the wilderness in his quest for the promised land—the land of milk and honey. Well, Moses, in all of those 40 years, never was able to enter the promised land himself, but he was able to get within sight of it.

So we are talking about 40 years of inadequate attention to an environmental problem. The environment is the order of the day. We had Earth Day this past Sunday. I did not attend it. But I was on Earth as a part of the homosapien species that is being affected by the environment, which needs to be cleaned up.

So here is $200 million for a new account entitled Environmental Restoration and Waste Management in the Department of Energy, to accelerate the Energy department's efforts.

The department has acknowledged that these problems result from 40 years—that should be repeated, 40 years. That is over half of my lifetime. I do not think I will be around long enough to take care of the whole problem, but I want to do my bit right now. I am trying to do a little of my share right here on this bill.

The funds provided in this supplemental appropriation are needed to reduce or prevent near-term public health and environmental degradation from these federally owned or operated facilities.

We in the Senate have just passed the clean air bill. I must confess right up front that I did not vote for it, but there were reasons that I think are to be found sprinkled throughout the debate as to why I did not vote for the bill. Nevertheless, the Senate passed the bill, and I may vote for the conference report when it comes back from the conference. It may be improved when it comes back from the House, improved from my viewpoint, which is only one person's viewpoint. But we pledged to clean up the environment. Can we now continue to assume business as usual should prevail with respect to the health risks associated with the Federal Government's own facilities?

This amendment is deficit neutral. The savings resulting from the reduced appropriations for aid to Panama are used to fully offset the increased outlays which resulted from the increased domestic appropriations. As far as the budget authority is concerned, I am advised that according to the latest CBO weekly scorekeeping report there is sufficient budget authority remaining for fiscal year 1990 to accommodate the budget authority in this amendment without triggering a Budget Act point of order on the section 311(a).

In truth, Mr. President, we have barely begun to address one of the most serious environmental crises that this Nation has to face. This environmental horror is the cleanup of nuclear waste in Government facilities. We must provide the funds to support our glowing words of the last few months.

I believe there is a real emergency in this land, and it is the mess in our nuclear weapons complex facilities. These facilities which are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Energy are in dire need of cleanup of nuclear waste. In fact, at the end of August 1988, the nuclear reactor DOE uses to make materials for nuclear weapons was shut down for safety reasons. None has been reopened. A GAO study released last week indicated that two-thirds of the safety and health problems identified by the General Accounting Office in the Nation's nuclear weapons facilities remain unresolved.

There are 15 major facilities in 12 States, including such well-known plants as Hanford in Washington State, Savannah River in South Carolina, Rocky Flats in Colorado, Oak Ridge in Tennessee, and Fernald in Ohio, as well as the lesser-known plants in Kansas City, MO, and Amarillo, TX. Unlike civilian nuclear power plants, these plants produce nuclear fuel, the components of nuclear bombs, and they have been operated without the extensive independent regulation to which the civilian plants are subject to.

This is the case where self-regulation has been an abysmal failure. The environmental problems created during 40 years of nuclear weapons production include thousands of abandoned and leaking waste disposal sites, spills of toxic and radioactive substances, and the release of other hazardous materials into the environment. In some cases the contamination is following pathways that could threaten the health of nearby residents, for example, seeping into their drinking water. Many of these problems stem from the fact that we did not know the dangers of radioactive waste when the plants were built, and disposal was careless.

When these plants were developed in the fifties, production needs were the top priority, not safety and environmental concerns. However, some of the problems stem from flagrant disregard for safety. For example, the Department of Energy confirmed a few days ago that 62 pounds of pure plutonium had been found in the ventilation system of Rocky Flats. That is 62 pounds of pure plutonium just in the ventilation system. Traces of radioactive waste have also been detected in ground water in the communities surrounding Rocky Flats.

Also at Rocky Flats, 70 FBI agents raided the Federal facility in early 1989 because there was so much evidence that Rocky Flats was acting in contravention of the law. The Department of Energy said that one of the incinerators had been shut down for safety and environmental reasons. That is disputed by the FBI which took infrared photographs in a night overflight of Rocky Flats. Those photographs indicate that the incinerator was burning radioactive wastes.

Last summer Admiral Watkins, as the new head of Department of Energy, issued a 5-year plan on the cleanup of these defense weapons facilities. He also reorganized the Department of Energy to centralize management of the cleanup. The Congress appropriated $2,218,000,000 for the Department of Energy's cleanup activities in fiscal year 1990.

In fact, the Congress thought that this was such an important problem facing the Nation that we added about $350 million to the President's request for defense waste management and cleanup. Admiral Watkins' 5-year plan recommended funding of $3,345,000,000 for fiscal year 1991.

Someone in the administration did not agree with Admiral Watkins because, when we received the President's budget, we discovered the administration was requesting only $2,791,000,000 for fiscal year 1991. That is $600 million that someone did not think was necessary for the cleanup efforts in fiscal year 1991. Yet we need to send Panama another half-billion now. Now, not next month, not next week. Do it in this bill. It was asked for several days ago. And they want it now—not 6 months from now, but right this minute.

I think someone has their priorities wrong. That is what we need to do. We need to discuss our priorities. That is one of the reasons I am offering this amendment on behalf of my colleagues. I think we ought to begin to discuss our priorities.

What are our priorities? How much do our domestic needs figure when we consider our priorities? If we are going to talk about foreign aid, let us discuss our priorities, or shall we just continue down the same old path that we have been walking for now these 40-odd years on foreign aid—never examining, just handing out more and more money to countries that have come to feel that they have an entitlement program? And we have given them good reason to feel that—just walk up to the window and get your check. You know how much it is. You know how much it is going to be. You know how much it is going to be before you come to the window.

We need a national debate on our priorities. This is a good way to start it. This is a good place to start it.

The Department of Energy is no longer even attempting to estimate the total costs for cleaning up these defense weapons facilities. The Department of Energy faces the enormous task of cleaning up 40 years of environmental contamination, controlling ongoing pollution which requires modernization of existing facilities and properly disposing of stored and newly generated waste.

Most of the potentially largest cleanup projects have yet to enter the planning phase. The Department of Energy is just beginning the process of determining the extent of contamination by old waste. We know that the Department of Energy will have to develop new technologies and treatment methods to accomplish its tasks. None of this will be cheap, and likely it will cost far more than we now think it will. It could take another 40 years. Who knows?

In 1988, the General Accounting Office estimated that total cleanup costs would exceed $100 billion. More recently, in testimony before a subcommittee of the House Energy and Commerce Committee in February, the Comptroller General estimated that cleaning up and modernizing the facilities will cost up to $155 billion. Moreover, he said, as more information is gathered, indications are that the final cost could be higher.

If the cleanup of the civilian facilities is any guideline, those costs over the past 5 years have escalated dramatically, either tripled or quadrupled depending on how one looks at it.

The analogy to the savings and loan bailout is not inappropriate here. Estimates for the savings and loan bailout seem to increase every time one turns around. I can remember when I thought they were estimated to be $130 million, lower, lower than $130 billion. I made a mistake to the one-thousandth degree—not $130 million, but $130 billion. That is real money. So it is $130 billion over the full 30 years. We first were talking about some $40 billion in the short term. We were not told what it would be in the long term. But it has had a way of becoming stretched, and stretched, and stretched, and who knows where it will end?

The most recent estimate that has been given was somewhere between $300 billion, and I believe I read that it would be as high as $500 billion, half a trillion dollars. So for all we know, those almost unimaginable numbers fit defense weapons cleanup as well.

I believe that the President's request for a second $500 million for Panama is not fully justified as a dire emergency. The chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, Mr. LEAHY, as I indicated earlier, had proposed to the full Appropriations Committee that Panama receive $300 million now.

We both agreed that the balance of Panama's needs could be met in a few months through the regular appropriations for foreign assistance. Thirty million dollars to stimulate tourism to Panama is just not an emergency. It is just not an emergency. One hundred thirty million dollars to pay Panama's debts to the multilateral banks so Panama can borrow more is just not an emergency, just not an emergency.

Twenty million dollars for building schools in Panama just is not an emergency. But cleaning up these nuclear weapons plants in the United States of America is an emergency now. I believe we have an obligation to help Panama.

It was our economic sanction that helped to devastate Panama's economy and our military intervention that caused great dislocation. So I am not unsympathetic to Panama's needs. I think we have a responsibility to help Panama to meet its immediate needs. But I have not seen the justification for the figures that we have been asked to put in this bill. And knowing that we are going to have a regular appropriations bill coming along within a few weeks, it seems to me we can wait a little while, get additional justifications and evidence before we trot out the full $500 million. The House made it $420 million. I think we can wait a little while, while we are showing some attention, giving some attention to the needs of our own people. Charity begins right here; charity begins at home.

I believe we have an obligation to help Panama, but we have another bill to deal with those things that are not emergencies—the regular appropriations for foreign assistance. Let us deal with Panama's emergency needs now and put off until the appropriate place and the appropriate bill the assistance necessary for the long-term rebuilding of Panama's economic and infrastructure.

Let us meet the emergency needs of our own environment. To that end, we are proposing in this amendment to appropriate $200 million to the Department of Energy for the cleanup of these defense weapons facilities; these funds would go to Admiral Watkins' centralized Office for Environmental and Waste Restoration and Waste Management. If we, as a nation, are really serious about cleaning up the environment, let us begin to direct our attention to this most egregious of environmental problems, nuclear waste in Government defense facilities.

It is fine to demand that the private sector clean up, as we have just done in the clean air legislation recently passed by this body; let the polluters pay, as has so often been said. But should the Government set the example? The Government can lead the way by cleaning up its own house, as well. Let the Government clean up its own house.

We, in this Nation, have to realize that we have serious, festering problems that demand attention. We have ignored our domestic needs for nearly a decade, and the chickens are coming home to roost. We can no longer ignore the needs of the citizens who pay the bills. It is fine to help Nicaragua, and we have a responsibility, based on the long history, that we all are well acquainted with. We need to help Nicaragua. We must do it. And it is fine to aid Panama. We have a responsibility there, but those worthy efforts must be scrutizined closely because we have dire needs, dire emergencies right here at home.

The growing cynicism about foreign aid—and it is out there beyond the beltway—if you do not believe it, go out beyond the beltway and ask John Q. Citizen down there on the street corners in Sutton, WV, or in Beaver Falls, PA, wherever, what do you think about foreign aid? See what he says. See what that citizen down there, that farmer who is struggling to pay his taxes, thinks about $130 million in this bill to help pay off Panama's international bank debts.

Ask the people in any State tourism bureau or organization in this country what do you think about $30 million for tourism in Panama? It is a dire emergency. We have a dire emergency supplemental here; we have to have it now, $30 million. What do you think about it? See what they say; get their answers.

We can use some of that money in West Virginia. Here not too long ago I was standing right in this very place, and my good friend from Pennsylvania was standing where he is now, Senator SPECTER, and we were pleading for some assistance for the coal miners, and non-mine workers who would lose their jobs because the legislation that was then before the Senate, we were asking for $100 million.

I reminded the Senate at that time that we were being requested by the administration for $100 million for Panama. We had already taken action on phase I of the administration's request in February for Panama, but we were going to be asked for $100 million more.

Those who were questioning the need for $500 million to put bread on the table of our own coal miners and our non-mine workers, who would lose their jobs as a result of that legislation, I knew they would not question this request when it came to the floor. Or I had a good feeling some of them would not. Just let the administration say, how much do you want, 500 million? No questions asked. Let us give it to them right now. We have to have it before the Easter break. It cannot wait.

With no questions asked, $500 million; very few questions asked, at least. I am glad they did not ask for a billion. But phase 1, plus phase 2 amounts to 1 billion. But how many additional questions would have been asked if there had been a request for a billion in this bill?

The mood here is that we just go along. The administration asks and we bend the knee; we curtsy, yes; yes, yes, Mr. President. How much do you want for foreign aid? No questions asked; few questions asked. But the administration wants it indelibly written in stone. It cannot be effaced, while our own people cry out for help. Which of you, if your son asked for bread, would give him a stone, or if your son asked for a fish would give him a serpent. And so to our own people's needs we say "Give them a stone; do not give them bread." But when it is somebody else, oh, the State Department just rushes headlong; give them; give, give, give.

If you go out there and ask those people beyond the beltway—after all, they are the people who send us here. I am not sent here by the Panamanian citizens. I am sent here by American citizens in West Virginia. They live and they breathe; they bleed and they suffer, and they die. We are going to lose a Member of the other body after this census, if the census is ever finally completed. We are going to lose a Member of the other body. When I came to the House of Representatives we had six Members in the House and now we are going to be down to three. That is showing what is happening to West Virginia, and there are other States in the same predicament.

Why? Because we are losing people. Why? Because we cannot keep our people. Why? Because we do not have the attractions; we do not have the jobs to keep our young people. That is why.

Perhaps if we had $30 million from the Federal Government to spend on tourism in West Virginia, perhaps we could utilize that money and put some people to work who would pay taxes, who would help with the Federal debt. My constituents, my American constituents, come before the constituents of the world.

I hope Senators will read "Timon of Athens." There they will find a good analogy of the condition that this Nation finds itself in. Before the day is over I may talk a little about "Timon of Athens."

But we all know the story of the prodigal son, how he went to his father and said, "Father, give me my portion of my substance." The father gave him his portion and he went away in a far country and spent it in riotous living.

And there came a famine and he hired himself out to a citizen in that faraway country, and he tended the hogs, the swine, and he fained would have eaten the husks that were fed to the swine. Finally he came to himself. That is the key line in the scriptures. He came to himself. We have not come to ourselves yet. But we are in the position of this prodigal son. We have been prodigal. We have been profusely prodigal, as was Timon. But the prodigal son came to himself and he said "I must arise and go to my father and ask his forgiveness." So he went home. We have not come home yet. We are still up in the rarified atmosphere of this Chamber floating around. When are we going to come home? When are we going to come to ourselves and see where our prodigality is taking us?

So go out there and ask those people. Do not just read the editorials from the local newspapers and the metropolitan press. Go out there and read the little Braxton County newspapers or the Jefferson County newspapers, or the Wood County newspaper, or the Hancock County newspaper. Go out there and read those little newspapers in your hometowns; talk to some of the people who are out of work in your own hometown in your own States. Ask them how they like the idea. Ask some of the schoolteachers. Ask some of the school administrators what do you think about sending $20 million to Panama for schools?

President Bush said he wanted to be the education President. I want to help him. Senator LEAHY and I wanted to help him, so we put $166 million into Head Start to bring it up to its full authorization. We say we want to be education Senators, education Senators. There were Senators before who were Presidents, here in this country as well as in Rome; 100 Senators; 100 Senators in the original Roman Senate. We want to be the education Senators. And we are putting our money where our mouths are. We are putting it in this bill, $166 million for Head Start. And we are not through yet.

So let us not ignore the needs of the citizens who pay the bills. It is time to think of them.

That growing cynicism out there is going to rip into foreign aid one day and it is going to rip into some of us if we do not start remembering the people back home first. We are stuck in a 1950's rut of throwing money at countries to shore them up and ensure and buy their friendship, and we will find out, if the going ever gets rough, what Timon found when he set out to borrow from some of those who had been the benefactors of his profuse giving: That those friends were fair weather friends and were worthless. One time we had the resources, the resources to do that. We did not have a $3 trillion debt. So we no longer have those resources. Our foreign aid programs are not crafted carefully or well. In these times of budget crisis they ought to be. It is about time that we stop being so freewheeling in our State Department foreign operations budgets.

We need every dollar that we can find to invest in critical needs here at home. So let us help our friends in the world, but let us be sure the dollars go to answer real needs. I cannot believe that $500 million is needed or $420 million is needed right now in this bill for Panama.

Remember our circle of friends who need help has just widened considerably in Eastern Europe. Try to be creative and find new ways to use foreign aid. That is what we need to do. Let us have a national debate. Let us titilate the appetite for debate out there beyond the beltway.

That is what I want to do here. Let us get a start. Let us jump start the debate. Let us jump start the debate about priorities, not only in foreign aid but throughout our entire budget. Let us jump start it.

We are talking about jump starting the economy in Panama and jump starting the economy in Nicaragua. Let us jump start the debate. Let us jump start the consideration with regard to where our priorities ought to be. Let us not just continue to go floating down the stream looking backward, over our shoulders, and never peering into the darkness ahead to say, "What is that?" Let us shine a flashlight out there on it. We only have a few dollars.

Flavius came to Timon and he said, "Here are your bills," and Timon said, "Well, sell some of my lands."

And Flavius, his honest and faithful steward said, "Your lands are already sold. You are bankrupt. You do not even have any credit left."

There can be a responsible foreign aid program. I am not saying there should not be any foreign aid program. I was on the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House when I came for my second term in the House of Representatives. When I was in my first term there, I had the very exalted position of being a member on the House Administration Committee. That was my committee assignment, the House Administration Committee. The second term, I was on the Foreign Affairs Committee. So I have been somewhat familiar with foreign aid matters and foreign appropriations for a long time.

But we need a responsible foreign aid program. We need to save vital dollars for our growing domestic needs. We can squeeze a little bit more out of the Federal budget for education, squeeze a little bit more from the Federal budget for the environment, for children, for our crumbling infrastructure.

Go out there beyond the beltway, south, east, north, or west, or at any points of the compass in between, and see what the needs are in the crumbling infrastructure: The bridges that need repair, the potholes in the roads. We have been building bridges and we have been building roads and we have been building schools and we have been building dams for other countries, now, for almost half a century. Let us see what our own needs are. Let us squeeze out a little more for our people—our people.

And I hope they are listening. Perhaps they will ask us: How did you vote? Did you remember me? Did you remember my needs? Or did you put someone else first?

Let us squeeze a little more out for health care in this country, and the myriad other needs at home. They are all crying out for long overdue attention. If we do not take a long, hard look at the way we parcel out our scarce dollars, the day will come when the American people are going to say, "Enough." And they would say "enough" now if they were fully attuned to what is going on.

The support for foreign aid programs is dwindling. We had a poll recently that demonstrated that the support out there for foreign aid programs is dwindling, and that will continue if those programs are not well justified and not well crafted.

It may be a little easier for us. We are dealing with somebody else's money. Oh, a little of it is mine; I pay taxes, too. But it is easy to stand up on this floor and be benevolent, philanthropic, and we all need to do some; we all need to be philanthropic. But read about Timon, who was excessively philanthropic, and then he swung from one extreme to another and became a misanthropist; from philanthropy to misanthropy.

Now, the responsibility lies right here in this body, and we are going to have a chance to step up to the bar and cast a vote today or tomorrow, or at some point. We do not have to knee jerk and say yes to every request sent here by any administration, Democratic or Republican.

Mt. Olympus is not at the other end of the avenue, the mount of all wisdom. There are 100 Members of this body and there is a collective wisdom here, and the Constitution reposes in this body and the other body of the Congress responsibility to legislate. So that is our job, and we will have an opportunity to say yes or no at some point on this amendment. We hold the purse strings.

I see where the President this morning is talking about a line-item veto. He wants a constitutional amendment, a line-item veto.

My friend, whenever we get started on that subject in here, there is going to be a long, long talk. A long talk. That constitutional amendment is not going to pass this body as long as ROBERT C. BYRD is here, and there are a few others who will stand with ROBERT C. BYRD. We are not going to roll over and play dead on that one.

So, Mr. President, just get ready. If you want to make that an issue and it comes up in this Senate, "Katie, bar the door." And we will throw every rule in the rule book that can be used against it.

So, if anybody in here has any big ideas that they are going to do something on the line-item veto, they better think twice.

Mr. McCAIN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I will be glad to yield for a question.

Mr. McCAIN. I wonder if the Senator knows that I and the Senator from Indiana intend to bring up the line-item veto, as we have in the past?

I wonder if the Senator knows that we intend to comply with the wishes of over 70 percent of the American people who, in poll after poll, have become disgusted with the budget system which we have now, which gives us a $3.3 trillion national debt and a continuing deficit of enormous proportions while, indeed, we continue to load unnecessary, wasteful spending on the appropriations bills?

And I wonder if the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee knows the President of the United States is on the right side of this issue, at least according to the will of the majority of American people. I intend to abide by this will, and assist in their desire to get this deficit under control. It is not only breaking the backs of working men and women today, but it is breaking the backs of future generations of Americans.

So, I wondered if the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee knows that not only has it been brought up in the past, but we will continue to bring it up in the future with the confidence that this popularly elected body will sooner or later bow to the overwhelming opinion of a majority of the American people who are totally correct in their view that a line-item veto, which 43 out of 50 Governors in America have and use, demand it.

I wonder if the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee knows that. Yes, he can use every rule, he can use every ploy. I bow to and admire and respect his incredible knowledge of the parliamentary process here, and I am sure that this debate can be delayed for years and years.

But I am also convinced that as long as the overwhelming majority of the American people, led by a popularly elected President of an overwhelming majority, want it, that we will indeed have a line-item veto someday, and I hope it is not in the too distant future.

Those of us who believe in it, along with over 70 percent of the American people, believe that we will prevail.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator has given me much food for thought. Yes, I am well aware that the Senator stands for a line-item veto, and he can bring it up as often as he wishes. That is his right. He can offer it to this bill. If he wants to kill this bill, he can offer it to this bill. Yes, this Senator is well aware. And the Senator refers to a popularly elected President. The President of the United States is elected by electors, not by the people. By electors. Has the Senator read his Constitution lately?

Mr. McCAIN. Will the Senator yield so I can answer his question?

Mr. BYRD. I have several of the Senator's questions to answer before I yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has the floor.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator may sit here for quite a while before I get through now. He talks about a popularly elected President. Senators are popularly elected. The Members of the Congress represent the American people, and they are directly elected by the American people. There is no go-between, no electors between them.

Let us listen to the forefathers, the Founding Fathers who wrote this Constitution, and when the Senator gets ready to debate the line-item veto, I will teach him a little English history. I say with all due respect that Senators who are elected to be Senators ought to know enough about this institution and about the Constitution and ought to take pride in it in having been elected to be a Senator of the United States, a part of the legislative branch in which our founding forefathers reposed the responsibility of the control of the purse. And now some would seem to give that control to a President. It is foolish to think that a Senator would advocate that. The purse strings should remain here in the legislative branch. We will talk at length, I say to my friend. Yes, I will be here, and it will not happen if I can keep it from happening. The Senator may be here longer than I will be. That is up to the Lord and the people of Arizona and the people of West Virginia.

I have some sense of history and some sense of what our forefathers meant and some sense of the fact that they were well acquainted with English experience, the experience of Englishmen who at times resorted to the sword and the shedding of their blood, so that the control of the purse might remain with the peoples' representatives in Parliament.

What does the Senator know when he speaks of the great majority of the American people would favor this? Perhaps they do, but if they are fully informed, which they will be before that constitutional amendment passes this Senate, if they are fully informed, that majority, that so-called majority, will change, I bet you on that because the American people, once they are fully and rightly informed, will make the right decision.

If you give the President the line-item veto, he will strike out moneys for WIC; he will strike out moneys for education; he will strike out moneys for mass transportation. Not just this President. I am saying any President, whether he is Democrat or Republican; he puts his britches on the same way. It does not make any difference whether he is Democrat or Republican. I am going to fight him when it comes to the line-item veto, and the army may contain 1,000 Senators like the Senator from Arizona. I will take them all on. All on. "Lay on MacDuff; and damned be him that first cries, hold, enough."

Mr. SPECTER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Not right now. I have several questions.

What a line-item veto means is the elimination of the need for the Congress. Franklin D. Roosevelt said, "Eliminate the Congress and we immediately cease to be a republic." If you turn over the control of those purse strings to the man downtown, whether he is a Democrat or Republican, you eliminate the need for a Congress. The Senator from Arizona does not need to be here any more. He will not need to be here any longer because the President will not only be the Chief Executive, he will be the chief legislator. It works something like this.

He would call me down to the White House one day and say, "Well, Bob, you're doing a great job for those people over in West Virginia," put his hands around my shoulder and, my goodness, how that would make me feel. He would hug me up a little close to him. "Good job, Bob. You did a great job down there. I know those coal miners like you, the way you stood up for them. They like you."

I would say, "Yes, Mr. President, they think a lot of me. They sent me here. I am now in my sixth term. I believe they will reelect me again. I do not know if the Lord will let me live."

He will say, "I'm sorry I couldn't be with you on that amendment," and I would say, "You are no sorrier than I am, Mr. President. I wish you could be with me."

He would say, "I have been watching your work on the Appropriations Committee all along. You have an item, I see, in the appropriations bill for Amtrak. I see you want to keep that passenger train running down there. And you have some moneys in there for cancer research. I want to help you, Bob."

"Yes, sir, Mr. President, I know you do."

"I want to help. I want to help you get that money for West Virginia. How are you going to be on the nomination of Mr. Bork?"

"Well, Mr. President, I thought and I thought and I thought," and I stuttered around a little bit, "but I cannot see it your way."

"Well, Bob, I wish you would give that another thought. I know you have money in there for Amtrak. You know, we have a treaty coming up there," Panama Canal Treaty or the Nuclear Weapons Treaty, whatever it may be. "How are you going to be on that treaty?"

"Well, I do not know, Mr. President. I kind of thought, based on the evidence of Dr. Teller and some of the other scientists, I might vote against the treaty."

He will say, "You know, Senator, I have a program, the thousand points of light program."

"You just stamped out 5,000 of those points of light when we passed the Clean Air Act without the coal miners."

"Well, Bob, let bygones be bygones. I want to help you with the items in the bill. Can you help me vote with you on this or that?"

Now, that is the way it would work, may I say to my friend, and I will venture to say that my arm is no less rubbery than the arm of the Senator from Arizona. I will say also to the Senator from Arizona that I have had experts hold my arm. I have been able to say no to Lyndon B. Johnson. Mr. Reagan was a piker when it came to twisting arms compared to Lyndon B. Johnson. So that is how foolish it is to even suggest there be a line-item veto.

The way I feel about it, I am either going to be a Senator or I am just going to go home, dive under the bed, and say, "Here goes nothing."

I am going to be a Senator, and I am going to defend the constitutional prerogatives of this legislative branch. Oh, I know they will say, well, you are talking about a constitutional amendment.

If the people want to change those, they can. That is true. But let us take a while and let the people know what they are doing when they go down that road.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Vermont for a question on that point?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I happen to concur with the Senator from West Virginia on this issue, but I note that the Senator from West Virginia has served longer on the Appropriations Committee than any of the rest of us and thus looked at a lot more budgets than the rest of us.

I remember in my days when I was here not as a Democratic Senator, President Johnson, I think, submitted the last balanced budget.

But I would ask the Senator from West Virginia two questions: One, is there anything in the law or the Constitution that prohibits the President of the United States from submitting a balanced budget to the Congress? And in the last 9 or 10 years, has the Senator from West Virginia seen any President submit a balanced budget to the Congress?

Mr. BYRD. There has been no balanced budget submitted to the Congress.

My LEAHY. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from West Virginia, is there anything that would prohibit the President, if he really wanted a balanced budget, from submitting one?

Mr. BYRD. Well, he should submit a balanced budget to the Congress.

Mr. LEAHY. He does not need a line-item veto amendment to submit a balanced budget if he wanted to, does he?

Mr. BYRD. Certainly not.

Mr. LEAHY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. I believe in the Constitution. I believe that the people would rue the day that the line-item veto was ever written into law or into that Constitution. I do not think to write it into law would be constitutional in itself. I think the Supreme Court would take care of that.

It is easy to say, oh, let us have a line-item veto and let the President have the responsibility.

That is our responsibility. The distinguished Senator from Arizona says that we have shirked our responsibility. Let the President do it. The President has not submitted a balanced budget, nor did his predecessor.

I am afraid, Mr. President, that I will not be able to take the time right now to answer all the Senator's questions, but I will be happy to give a great deal of time and attention to that whenever the item comes before the Senate. My suggestion is at that time most Senators could just go home and talk to the people about how they feel, because there would not be any votes going on here, unless we got into a mean filibuster. We have not had a mean one in a long time. We have not had a mean one like the old days.

So, Mr. President, we have the control of the purse, we have the oversight, and the legislative branch has the expertise. We know what the needs are at home. We know all too well what our budget situation is. It is time to stop business as usual now. We have turned the corner on a new decade and our own Nation is hurting and hurting severely. Poverty, homelessness, poor health abound right here, right here in Arizona, right here in Vermont, right here in West Virginia, right here in the District of Columbia. We do not even have to go outside the beltway to see the poverty and the homelessness. Charity begins at home, and it is time that we all remember that.

Mr. President, I know there are other Senators who wish to speak, and I am going to be fully protective of the Republican leader's amendment, so I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to—who was first, this Senator or this Senator?

Mr. SPECTER. I believe I was here first, I say to the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. I yield to the Senator for a statement—for how long?

Mr. SPECTER. My purpose, Mr. President, would be to raise a question with Senator BYRD on the presentation which the Senator has made. But I would seek the floor in my own right to direct a question, if the distinguished Senator from West Virginia can remain, and then I have a brief statement which would be made by myself after I have a brief discussion with Senator BYRD. But I would seek the floor in my own right.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not mean to hog the floor, but I am going to protect my own amendment and I am going to protect the Republican leader's amendment. I yield to the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. HATFIELD] for such time as he may desire to make a statement, with the request that I retain my rights to the floor.

Mr. SPECTER. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SPECTER. There is objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SPECTER. The distinguished Senator from West Virginia has the right to yield for a question.

Mr. BYRD. I yield for a question. I yield for a question.

Mr. SPECTER. In that event, I will not prolong the debate on the process of yielding, as the distinguished Senator from West Virginia and I had a long discussion on that in the past.

The question which I would propound to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia turns on the issue of priorities and the very excellent speech which he has made for the past—I have been on the floor for 1 hour and 50 minutes. He has not been speaking for that entire time, but it has been a profound speech. I say it with great respect because the distinguished Senator from West Virginia as chairman of the Appropriations Committee lends great experience and wisdom to the appropriations process.

When the Appropriations Committee considered this issue of funding for Panama yesterday—and I would leave the issue of the line-item veto and come back to the pending amendment which is the amount of money for Panama—the consideration raised was whether money ought to be better spent on Eastern Europe as opposed to Panama. We had the vote, and the figure was established by the committee at $420 million instead of $300 million.

Now, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia has proposed an amendment today which would utilize $120 million for domestic programs, bringing the $420 million down to the $300 million figure. The programs which he has articulated are programs of enormous importance when he talks about the environment, health, farms. They are issues which a Senator would vote against at his peril, at his great peril. When the distinguished Senator from West Virginia talks about cynicism for foreign aid, and he mentions Beaver Falls, PA, I can vouch for that. When he says if you ask anybody, "what do you think of foreign aid?" they would tell you "no," I would go him one better, and I would say you will not have to ask somebody. I have open house town meetings. I was in Lancaster, PA; I was in Lebanon, PA; and I was in Washington, PA. I did not have to ask the people what they thought of foreign aid. They told me what they thought of foreign aid. And they do not want foreign aid to be provided by the U.S. Congress.

The distinguished Senator from West Virginia said "They would say enough now if they were fully attuned." Well, the Senator from West Virginia is right. This amendment at-tunes the American people to what this issue is.

But, and I am coming to a question. The question is, "Why $300 million?" The distinguished Senator from West Virginia has eloquently articulated reasons why we should not have money for tourism in Panama, why we should not have money to pay the International Bank, and why we should not have $20 million for schools for Panama. But when the distinguished Senator from West Virginia allows $300 million to go to Panama, they are going to use that money for those purposes. They are going to use the money for the schools. They are going to use the money in part to pay the debt. They are going to use the money in part for tourism.

So that I come to the conclusion that the distinguished Senator from West Virginia is right as far as he has gone, but he has not gone far enough. The figure for Panama ought to be zero because if you line up these programs on one side you have a private sector revitalization credit of $185 million for Panama: $45 million for construction, $50 million for manufacturing earnings, $30 million for tourism, $35 million for commerce, $25 million for agriculture. Then you line up public sector investment programs of $140 million, and you line up assistance in clearing IFI arrears of $130 million. On the other side, when you include for health programs, $2.5 million; environment, $32.5 million; agriculture in the United States, $4 million; WIC, the Women, Infants, and Children Program, $11.6 million; there is no question that the American people will say "no foreign aid." We should not spend the money in Panama on those programs in comparison to spending the money in the United States on these programs.

We know that we spend $16 billion a year on foreign aid, less than or about 1 percent of our Federal budget. We do so because of a conclusion that it is in the national self-interest of the United States. I will not talk now, I will talk in a moment about Nicaragua and the necessity for that money and the programs of not having it advanced before the inauguration of President Chamorro yesterday. And that when we talk about Panama we talk about this money because Panama is important to the United States.

We have 15,000 military personnel which costs a lot more than $430 million. We have the Panama Canal which is vital for U.S. national interest. We have the protection of the Western Hemisphere. We have a military action in Panama which cost a lot more than money. It cost American lives. So when we talk about Panama we talk about national self-interest of the United States in proceeding to spend that money.

But when we "attune" the American people, in the words of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia, and put these matters side by side, there is no way that the American people will support any expenditures for Panama in preference to expenditures in the United States.

So when the distinguished Senator from West Virginia is attuning the American people he is doing a wonderful job, but the conclusion it seems to me is zero. So now I will come to one question.

My one question to Senator BYRD is, why should we allocate $300 million to Panama which he is proposing—that is his proposition—by only cutting $120 million? He is proposing spending $300 million for Panama. Why should we spend that money instead of putting up money for the homeless, for AIDS, for Women, Infants, and Children, education, and environment in the United States?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator has asked a very good and appropriate question. Before asking the question he builds a premise which is a very worthy premise, and which would automatically require the answer that the Senator has just stated. It should be zero. I will tell him why I am suggesting $300 million.
